FOREWORD

The genesis of this book has been both unusually long and fortuitous. Its origins lie with Marcus Burke's dissertation completed in 1984 for the Institute of Fine Arts at New York University, a work that even then had already gained a considerable reputation because of its scope and originality. At a time when very little of a comprehensive nature had been published on collecting in Spain, Burke's dissertation on Italian art in Spanish collections pulled together a large number of unpublished documents and synthesized them into a wide-ranging interpretation of the history of taste during Spain's Golden Age. His work concentrated on the great noble collectors of the period whose activity could be traced not only in Spain but in the lands under Spanish control, from as far afield as Italy to the east and The Netherlands to the north. Although individual documents on single collections had appeared over a long period and in a vast and confusing variety of local journals and newspapers, here finally was a careful analysis of the field as a whole, combined with a large number of crucial but previously unpublished inventories.

The word "fortuitous" is appropriate because it was just at the moment that Burke completed his dissertation that the Getty Provenance Index embarked on a program of automating archival material as a means of documenting a comprehensive history of collecting in Europe prior to the nineteenth century. Although we had already come into contact with Marcus Burke on earlier occasions, it was Ellis Waterhouse, a colleague we had in common and a perpetual source of useful references, who pointed out the relevance of his work for our new project. Jonathan Brown, Burke's adviser, also played an important role in bringing about the collaboration, as well as assisting in the project's development at various points along the way. In the summer of 1984 Burke was invited to California for eight weeks to begin the process of converting his data into electronic form.

The Provenance Index of that time was still a young department, consisting of historians and former museum staff who were still struggling to come to grips with automation and were barely familiar with their new computer given them by the Getty Trust. Marcus Burke's ideas of how archival inventories could be automated were much more advanced than our own, and it took a while for his message to sink in. It was Marcus who laid out the first proposals for parsing such documents and described how the work might be done, although it was only the following year that any significant amount of transcribing was attempted, and the initial efforts concentrated on Italian documents, not Spanish. Nonetheless, his recommendations served as the basis for such work and were incorporated as the staff learned to take advantage of them.

Since the principal thrust of the archival projects was to begin publishing in automated form the vast corpus of unknown inventories yet to be identified in public and private European archives, it was agreed with Burke that we would attempt to flesh out his own list of documents in the hope of achieving something closer to comprehensiveness. With his usual breadth of vision, Burke hoped to make the book a summary of relevant research from the nineteenth century until the present time, including a complete list of every known inventory (both published and unpublished) and including as well a full bibliography that could serve as a definitive guide to the subject. Initially these efforts were aided by Angela Delaforce, an authority on Spanish and Portuguese collecting in the sixteenth and early seventeenth century, who prepared for us a useful bibliography on the subject and copies of some inventories that had already been published. Before long, however, it was concluded that a more intensive effort was required, ideally to involve someone working in Madrid, and it was this decision that led us to Peter Cherry, who, although still a graduate student at the Courtauld Institute, already had a reputation as the person who had dredged through a larger number of Madrid documents than any of his contemporaries. Cherry was employed from 1986 until 1989 to identify and acquire copies of inventories in the Archivo Histórico de Protocolos that could be added to those already known to us through Marcus Burke.

The nature of the inventories found by Cherry carried the work into a domain that differed considerably from the material treated in Burke's dissertation. They documented the possessions of a wide range of non-noble collectors and miscellaneous members of the court whose activity had previously been ignored or overlooked. Their inventories were not as rich as those of the nobility, but they yielded a more complete view of collecting in Madrid society than was possible when the focus was only those men surrounding the king. In the course of his work on Spanish still lifes, the subject of his dissertation, Cherry had come to study these non-noble collectors more thoroughly than his predecessors, and consequently it was decided that he was also the best person to discuss this kind of document within the scope of the project. Thus the book came to combine the efforts of two people with different though compatible approaches to the subject.

During this period of expansion the Provenance Index emphasized Italian archives, in part because its staff included no one with a specialized knowledge of Spanish art history. It was only in 1988 that Maria Gilbert took on the task of overseeing the project and began to systematically transfer the data to the computer. Since that time Ms. Gilbert has overseen the project in all its details, from transcribing the documents using photocopies of the originals, to adding subject classifications from Iconclass, and later to researching the present location of the paintings and organizing the data in the computer, ultimately making possible its publication in book form. In a real sense it has become Ms. Gilbert's book, since the two original authors had taken on other duties in other parts of the world; although both of them spent brief periods of time in California while the book was progressing, for the past few years it was Ms. Gilbert who crafted the various texts, the numerous documents, and the vast number of references into a final book that we hope does not betray its diverse origins and its lengthy gestation.

The final result is, we hope, as nearly comprehensive as was originally aspired to. In the course of the thirteen years that have elapsed since the book was first put into motion, a certain amount has been published, and a few important documents have been found by other scholars that could not be incorporated here. Our ability to utilize automation has improved greatly, and although we would no longer attempt so large a project without the collaboration of another institution – normally one with some proximity to the source of the documents – the final result at least is very close to the book initially envisaged.

Having said that, it needs to be noted that the transcriptions found in the present book are limited primarily to paintings, reflecting the interests of the two authors and the methods in force when the Provenance Index first came into being a decade and one half ago. Until fairly recent times it was not unusual to drastically excerpt a document in order to concentrate on those parts of most interest to the compilers. In the meantime, however, this practice has declined, and a decision has been taken by the Provenance Index to publish transcriptions that encompass a wider and more comprehensive range of objects.

Future books will generally include every work of art as well as, on occasion, items that have primarily an historical or documentary value. The present book is the last of those undertaken during our youth, and in this sense does not represent what is to come.

The Getty Provenance Index and the Getty Information Institute are grateful indeed to Marcus Burke for having given the initial impetus to the project, to Peter Cherry for having given it a different and important dimension, and finally to Maria Gilbert for having brought it to a successful conclusion. To all three we extend our thanks for many years of patient effort, the benefits of which should finally be apparent to all. Finally, we are all indebted to Jonathan Brown and William Jordan for their consistent generosity and advice. Everyone involved is aware that, without these two men, the book would not have come into being.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

No one could prepare a work of this scope and complexity without the help of many others as collaborators, colleagues, resources, and advisors. First among these stands Burton B. Fredericksen, Director of the Getty Provenance Index, who, as patron and guide, made it possible to bring many years of research to fruition. His associate, Carol Togneri, has overseen this project throughout its development.

A great debt is owed to our predecessors in the study of patronage and collecting Cristóbal Pérez Pastor, the Marqués de Saltillo, the Marqués de Lozoya, María Luisa Caturla, F. J. Sánchez Cantón, Yves Bottineau, and Alfonso E. Pérez Sánchez. We have also benefitted enormously from the spirit and generosity of our archivist colleagues Mercedes Agulló Cobo, J.L. Barrio Moya, Duncan Kinkead, and Angela Delaforce, who provided some of the inventories for this volume. Pérez Sánchez (whose study of Italian painting in seventeenth-century Spain was the starting point for Burke's investigations), John H. Elliott, Jonathan Brown, Barbara von Barghahn, Jesús Cantera Montenegro, Jennifer Fletcher, Rosemarie Mulcahy, Gabriele Finaldi, Nigel Glendinning, William B. Jordan, Enriqueta Harris Frankfort, Miguel Morán, Steven N. Orso, Sarah Schroth and Pilar Silva Maroto have each generously shared many insights and useful information. As the former advisor to Burke at the New York University Institute of Fine Arts, Jonathan Brown deserves special mention, since much Burke's present text is a revision of his doctoral dissertation (1984), written under Brown's supervision.

In recent years, important studies of Spanish collecting have been published by Miguel Moran and Fernando Checa, Vicente Lleó Cañal, Mercedes Agulló, Sarah Schroth, J.L. Barrio Moya, Richard Kagan, and Brown himself. Extremely important details, in many cases unpublished, have been provided by Dawson Carr, W. Alexander Vergara, Elizabeth Nicklas, Mary Crawford Volk, Neil de Marchi, Mauro Natale, and Edward Goldberg. Jonathan Brown and William Jordan were also kind enough to read the text in manuscript and provide many essential points of revision. The introductory essay to the 1691 valuation of the Almirante de Castilla (Doc. 117) was provided by Luisa Elena Alcalá.

Gratitude is due to the Sres. Duques de Berwick y Alba, who allowed access to the Carpio papers in the Alba Archives of the Palacio de Liria, Madrid; to the staffs of the Archivo del Palacio and the Archivo Histórico Nacional, Madrid; and to our always helpful colleagues at the Archivo Histórico de Protocolos, Madrid, and especially to César Palomino Tossas, Teresa Baratech, Fuencisla Lillo and Angeles Montes. Some of the research for this project was underwritten by a travel grant from the American Council of Learned Societies.

At the Provenance Index, the essential, enormously difficult task of transcribing the documents was largely borne by Maria L. Gilbert; she also contributed many of the possible identifications of the inventoried pictures as well as serving as the editor of this volume. The authors express their deepest gratitude to Maria Gilbert for her enthusiasm, dedication and good humour during the realisation of this project, and without whom this book would not have seen the light of day. Gilbert, Burton B. Fredericksen, and especially Patricia Teter, conducted the research on the artist attributions. The iconographical classifications were assigned by Gilbert with the assistance of Elizabeth Spatz. Certain inventory transcriptions were provided by Luisa Elena Alcalá, Alison Nameth, and Oscar Vázquez. The text of the introduction and essays was given a final edit by Nancy Bryan of the Getty Information Institute.

With special gratitude for their hospitality and personal support, the authors wish to thank Lenka Pichlikova, Rafael and Ana Larroque, Enrique and Maria Angeles Juan de Robledo, the staff of the Spanish offices of Southern Methodist University, and especially Valerie Anne Cherry, Jo Beech, John Bennett, Maria del Carmen Garrido, Catherine Marshall, Maria Redpath, Tonia Raquejo and Julian Manley for living so long with this book.

PREFACE

For approximately 150 years, from about 1550 to 1700, there occurred in the group of nations we today call “Spain” an explosion of cultural energy known as the Siglo de Oro: the Spanish Golden Age. During the reigns of the Hapsburgs Philip II, Philip III, Philip IV, and Charles II, artists such as El Greco, Ribera, Velázquez, Murillo, Carreño, and Coello (not to mention Cervantes, Lope de Vega, Quevedo, Calderón, Góngora, and the other great literary figures of the age) created many of the famous masterpieces of world art. At the beginning of the period, Spain was the most powerful country in Europe and perhaps in the world, its international monarchy comprising much of Europe, most of the New World, and parts of Asia and Africa. As might be expected, Spanish patrons were active internationally, especially in Rome, in southern Italy, and in Flanders – the latter two being the principal European parts of the Spanish monarchy.

Above all, the era witnessed a fashion, even a mania, for collecting paintings, which eventually affected a surprisingly wide range of Spaniards, from the king, his nobles, and his ministers down to relatively humble subjects in Madrid. In 1638 the English ambassador in Madrid, Sir Arthur Hopton, filed one of many reports with the diplomat and art collector, Sir Francis Cottington, who had preceded him in Spain. Hopton had presented a group of pictures sent by Queen Henrietta Maria to the Spanish court and had found Spanish connoisseurship to be somewhat more exacting than that of his own monarch:

I delivered those [pictures] which her Mat<sup>ie</sup> sent, we<sup>h</sup> were discovered to be no Originalls. They are now become more judicious in & more affectiond unto the Art of Paynting, then they have beene, or then the world imagines. And the King within this 12 moneth, hath gotten an incredible numb<sup>r</sup> of ancient & of the best moderne hands & over wt<sup>h</sup> the Conde de Monte Rey came the best of Italye, particularly the Bacchanalian of Titian & in this towne is not a peece worth any thing but the King takes & payes very well for them & in his imitation the Admirante [,] Don Lewis de Faro, and many others are making Collections.<sup>1</sup>

In his nine years of residence in Madrid, Hopton had discovered what has since become clear to modern scholars: as connoisseurs and collectors of fine art, the Spanish of seventeenth-century Madrid were second to none.

No decade of the century, with the possible exception of the 1690s, passed without the formation of a major private collection. Furthermore, the art collections assembled in Golden Age Madrid were often enormous, sometimes comprising thousands of pictures. This volume attempts to describe how and why these collections were assembled, and their effect on the artistic and cultural life of Spain.

This book is necessarily document-centered, arranged according to sources of information rather than other historical criteria. We seek above all to provide reliable transcriptions of documents, for the most part from seventeenth-century Madrid, and to present the data from these documents in an analytically useful way. To balance the datacentric nature of the endeavor, we also seek to provide a historical framework for the information, so that the true work of historians, the interpretation of data in the light of contemporary values, may proceed. The Introduction is therefore designed to be a brief history of collecting in Golden Age Spain, augmented by the more specific discussions in the essays – which we will call “entries” – introducing each family of collectors. We have attempted to separate each subject’s influence as a patron from his or her activities as a collector, even though the data we are working with – inventories of collections – tend to conflate the two. Inevitably, some subjects offer more of an historical image than others; many others are remembered today only because they once owned pictures. Taken as a whole, however, the histories and the data reveal much about a previous era and offer tantalizing leads for further historical and art-historical investigations.

SEVENTEENTH-CENTURY SPANISH TASTE

Peter Cherry

The Taste for Paintings

For Philip IV, the visit of Peter Paul Rubens to Madrid in 1628 must have been one of the most stimulating and formative events of his reign. Rubens had come to the Spanish court as an ambassador of the Regent of the Netherlands, and predictably the king had reservations about having to treat affairs of state with a “common painter.” However Philip eventually sat for Rubens for his portrait – breaking Velázquez’s monopoly on royal sittings – and in the course of time he made almost daily visits to his Alcázar studio to converse with the artist and watch him at work.<sup>1</sup> Philip had inherited the best picture collection in Europe, and soon after the Fleming’s seven month sojourn, the young king began to emerge as a picture collector on a grand scale.<sup>2</sup> Under such circumstances, it is not difficult to grasp why Rubens had such a profound effect in forming royal taste.

A shrewd judge of character, Rubens was comparably impressed by the king’s personality and the “extreme delight” he took in painting. Philip had been trained in drawing by the Dominican painter Juan Bautista Mayno, and all writers on art in the period stressed that the king painted. One contemporary portrait depicts the king surrounded with the attributes of painting, and another shows Philip in the act of painting a Virgin of the Immaculate Conception.<sup>3</sup> Other members of the royal family were also trained in art.<sup>4</sup> Such images affirmed royal support for the profession and underscored the importance of painting in the service of the Catholic faith (in the eyes of most Spaniards, the whole raison d’être of the art).<sup>5</sup> Given his upbringing, it is not surprising that Philip became one of the greatest collectors of paintings of his age,

1. In a letter from Madrid, dated 2 December 1628, Rubens wrote that the king “takes an extreme delight in painting, and in my opinion this prince is endowed with excellent qualities. I know him already by personal contact, for since I have rooms in the palace, he comes to see me almost every day.” R. Magurn, The Letters of Peter Paul Rubens, Cambridge, MA, 1971, p. 292. While the king knighted Rubens in 1631 in recognition of his diplomatic services, his later enlightened intervention to help Velázquez gain entry into the Order of Santiago (1659) was in recompense for his artistic services. Indeed, a meaningful, if superficial, reading of Velázquez’s Las Meninas (Fig. 2) shows the artist in the act of painting, celebrating his proximity to the monarch and the royal family.

2. See Brown 1995, p.119. Brown points out that the construction of both the Buen Retiro and the Torre de la Parada at this time contributed greatly to Philip IV’s need to acquire large quantities of pictures.

3. This first picture, by Juan Martínez de Gradilla, a follower of Zurbarán, was from the chapel of the Seville painters’ confraternity, the Hermandad de San Lucas in the Churey of San Andrés, and was in the Stirling Maxwell collection. The latter portrait was a seventeenth-century work in the collection of the Conde de la Unión, Navarra.

4. Philip’s brother, the infante Carlos, painted a St. Anthony and the Christ child, and Philip’s son, the Infante Juan José de Austria, was trained in drawing by Eugenio de las Cuevas and practised painting as well as being an astute connoisseur; he even instructed his own pages in the art of painting. Palomino (ed. 1986, pp. 342–343) names him as Don Francisco de Vera Cabeza de Vaca. For the Infante Carlos’s painting, see Angulo and Pérez Sánchez 1969, p. 369; E. Montaner López, Pintura barroca en Salamanca. Escuela española, 1987, pp. 34–35.

5. See J. Gállego, “Felipe IV pintor,” in A. Gállego-Morell et al., eds., Estudios sobre la literatura y arte dedicados al Profesor Emilio Orozco Díaz, vol. 1, 1979, pp. 533–540.

providing at the same time a sympathetic ambience for countless other collectors who emulated the royal model.<sup>6</sup> Paintings became a kind of currency that could be exchanged or used as gifts in order to curry favor, and the practice of collecting permeated many levels of Spanish society. The most active collectors were generally members of the court, especially the numerous viceroys who governed the extensive lands under Spanish control, including Flanders – Rubens’ home – as well as parts of the Italian peninsula: Milan, Naples,<sup>7</sup> and Sicily. On a more modest level, it was common for ecclesiastics who travelled to the papal court in Rome to return home with pictures.<sup>8</sup> These acquisitions served to lend some lustre to the image and status of their owners, but they could also be used to obtain favours from higher officials, or even from the king, whose tastes were carefully observed. Some of the viceroys were especially instrumental in decorating the royal Buen Retiro Palace.<sup>9</sup>

Visitors to the main state room of the Alcázar – the New Room, later the Hall of Mirrors – were dazzled by the display of masterpieces from the king’s collection.<sup>10</sup> None, however, would have been surprised by the fact that almost all of these were by Italian and Flemish hands. The fact that Philip IV did not collect Spanish pictures, but only foreign imports, may seem paradoxical today. However, since the reign of Philip II, Spanish connoisseurs focused on Italian painting, and cultivated Spaniards fully acknowledged the traditional lead of Italy in cultural matters (as well as their technical expertise in fresco painting and bronze casting). It was, of course, also a prerogative of power that the very best works of world art should find their way into the collection of the King of Spain, Europe’s most powerful ruler. Given Spanish imperial hegemony and political influence in Europe, too, many Spaniards would have been “at home” in Flanders and Italy; the human traffic throughout the empire familiarised more people than we might imagine with the art of these countries. In a real sense, then, paintings from Flanders and Italy may not have seemed strictly “foreign” to the eyes of Spanish connoisseurs.

The Taste for Flemish and Italian Painting at Court

In 1628 Rubens brought to Madrid eight of his own works, which effectively converted Philip to his art.<sup>11</sup> Indeed, Philip IV’s patronage of Rubens can be seen as paralleling Philip II’s of Titian. Rubens’ paintings came to dominate the Alcázar collection; more than 60 of his works were inventoried in the palace by 1682, and in 1686 the Hall of Mirrors displayed examples from the full range of his art: portraiture, biblical

8. This volume includes the inventory of Don Juan de Matute, a canon of Granada Cathedral, who appears to have spent time in Rome, where many of his pictures were painted, and who died on a visit to the court of Madrid in 1629 (Doc. 14). Remarkably, Matute owned a copy of Caravaggio’s Boy with a Ram (Doc. 14, no. 13; the original is in the Capitoline Museum, Rome), which he listed in his own inventory as a copy of a famous painting in the Mattei collection in Rome calling it “St. John nude holding the lamb,” without a hint of the classical or homoerotic dimensions noted in modern interpretations. and classical history, and mythology.<sup>12</sup> Rubens' mythological paintings hung at the Torre de la Parada, and copies of them by Juan Bautista del Mazo were in the Madrid Alcázar. Rubens was almost universally admired in Spain and the most sought-after northern master. In Philip IV's reign, the Marqués de Leganés used his diplomatic posting to Flanders to begin assembling the most spectacular collection of Flemish painting in private hands in Spain, which remained intact during the seventeenth century by being entailed to the family estate. On a lesser scale, Don Miguel de Salamanca acquired his taste for Flemish painting while serving in Flanders.<sup>13</sup> Leganés knew Rubens and he commissioned works from the artist at first hand. Collectors of the wealth and distinction of Leganés or indeed the Marqués del Carpio were careful to show appropriate deference to the king in the pursuit of art. The 1636 inventory of the royal collection is unusual in that it notes the donations of pictures to Philip by many aristocrats, courtiers, and private individuals, who may have gained the favour of the young monarch through such gifts.<sup>14</sup> In 1628 Rubens painted for Leganés an Immaculate Conception, a quintessentially "Spanish" subject which he prudently and wisely immediately donated to the Crown.<sup>15</sup> A few years later, however, Leganés threw a tantrum when asked to furnish a number of rooms of the Buen Retiro with pictures from his own collection. Indeed, the set of small Flemish still lifes by Alexander Adrienssen (Museo del Prado, Madrid) that Leganés willed to the king on his death in 1655 are intriguing curiosities that pale into insignificance alongside the many masterpieces of figure subjects in his collection of some 1,300 pictures.<sup>16</sup>

The prestige of Rubens and Van Dyck was immense among Spanish collectors; it increased throughout the seventeenth century in Spain along with that of sixteenth-century Venetian artists. Attributions in inventories testify to the large numbers of copies in collections in Madrid. High-quality Flemish prints after Rubens and Van Dyck were imported and also collected and displayed in collections such as that of the Duc d'Aarschot (Docs. 30 and 31).<sup>17</sup> Some Madrid collections of the second half of the seventeenth century, including those of the Conde de Molina (Doc. 93) and Conde de Fuensaldaña,<sup>18</sup> were notable for the particular taste of their noble owners for paintings from Flanders. Philip IV's son, the Infante Don Juan José of Austria (1629–1679), governor of the Low Countries between 1656–1659, collected the Flemish school, particularly the genre paintings of David Teniers.<sup>19</sup> It was not uncommon for Flemish residents in the capital (the most distinguished of whom was the Duc d'Aarschot) to own distinguished paintings of their native school, either brought with them to Spain or imported subsequently. Merchants also owned important collections of Flemish paintings; the inventory of capital of the Flemish merchant Pedro van Vucht (Doc. 34) was headed by a Descent from the Cross by Jordaens, valued at 3,000 reales, and included other works attributed to Flemish masters, as well as a range of subjects typical of this school, such as the Five Senses, the Elements, landscapes, hunting scenes, and mythologies. Pedro was the brother of Jan van Vucht, Madrid agent of the Moretus Printing Works, who in 1639 bequeathed Rubens' altarpiece of the Martyrdom of St Andrew to the chapel of the Hospital de los Flamencos, the hostel for Flemish residents in the Spanish capital.<sup>20</sup>

Paintings were among the most common goods imported from Spanish Flanders, and lienzos de Flandes appear to have increased in volume throughout the century owing to the special trading links between Spain and the Spanish Netherlands.<sup>21</sup> The massive trade deficit with Flanders in paintings even led to a proposal in 1598 that instead of being imported, the paintings should be made in Spain.<sup>22</sup> The fruit of this importation was a range of secular picture types long associated with the Flemish school, primarily landscapes, still lifes, flower paintings, and genre scenes that were common in Madrid collections. In Italy, and perhaps also in Spain, Flemish devotional painting was also popular for its direct appeal to pious emotions.<sup>23</sup> Spanish collectors' high regard for contemporary northern religious paintings appears reflected in the choice of Flemish-style religious paintings after compositions by Rubens depicted on top of an expensive buffet (escritorio) in a number of still lifes by the Valencian artist Tomás Hiepes.<sup>24</sup> Although not always identified as Flemish works in post-mortem inventories of collections, large consignments of devotional pictures, frequently small and on copper (listed as láminas in inventories), were regularly shipped to Spain throughout the period. Typical of this trade is a lot of 120 devotional coppers painted by the Antwerp artists Gaspar Goosens and Damian van den Vequen, sent to Seville for sale by the merchant and dealer Crysostoom van Immerseel in 1631.<sup>25</sup> In 1640, five religious paintings were listed among 70 pictures imported from Flanders by the Madrid collector Juan César Scazuola.<sup>26</sup>

25. Van Immerseel was the main importer of Flemish paintings in Seville from ca. 1623–early 1640. In 1610, an Antwerp merchant, Solomon Paradis, opened a paintings shop in Seville near the cathedral, and in 1621 Antwerp painters were unable to satisfy all their Spanish orders. By 1646, there were at least three Sevillian shops specialising in Flemish paintings. See E. Stols, “La colonia flamenca de Sevilla y el comercio de los Países Bajos españoles en la primera mitad del siglo XVII,” Anuario de Historia Económica y Social, 2 (1969), pp. 376–377. 26. Scazuola, knight of the Order of Calatrava, Tesorero general de la Santa Cruzada, was also an asentista of the king (Elliott, Richelieu and Olivares, Cambridge, UK, 1986, p. 476). On his death in November 1639, his estate was inventoried (AHPM, Prot. 7.805, ff. 1103–1125) and his picture collection appraised by the painter Jusepe Leonardo, who valued the lot of 70 paintings said to have recently arrived from Flanders, on 6 February 1640 (AHPM, Prot. 7.805, ff. 1067v–1068v). These were mostly landscapes, but included paintings of the Nativity of Christ, SS. Paul and Anthony, Supper at Emmaus, Virgin and Child, Christ on the Way to Calvary, as well as a genre subject of a woman with fruit. However, all of the figurative subjects were described as “copies” in the document.

Despite the enormous popularity of Flemish painting by minor masters, Spanish art treatises tended to denigrate the school as simple and unsophisticated. Pacheco considered the Flemish manner “dry” and advised looking to Italy for the “good style” (buena manera).<sup>27</sup> For these writers, and in accordance with the anthropocentric emphasis and idealising values of Italian art theory, the appeal of most Flemish art depended on bright colours and a detailed transcription of natural appearances.<sup>28</sup> It was, of course, precisely this perceived “naturalism” in northern painting that made Flemish landscapes, still lifes, and flower painting so sought after in Spain. However, there may also have been a widespread attitude among even minor painters in Antwerp and Brussels that the Spanish market was relatively undiscerning and was able to absorb even very low-grade works.<sup>29</sup>

Italian painters who visited Spain in the seventeenth century may have been drawn there by the traditional esteem enjoyed by foreign artists in the Peninsula.<sup>30</sup> It was well known that Philip II’s Escorial had been decorated by Italian artists, and a legacy of this fact may have been the promise of financial rewards in Spain, perhaps even stories of an excess of American silver, indiscriminating taste, and a dearth of native talent.<sup>31</sup> Rubens’ impressions of painting at the Spanish court in 1603 are well known: in letters back to his Mantuan patrons, he joked about the incompetence of Spanish painters and the low level of connoisseurship among courtiers, and it took many years for such opinions to dissipate entirely.<sup>32</sup> Italian and Flemish painters were also accustomed to shipping paintings to the Spanish market; in his letter on painting, the Roman collector Vincenzo Giustiniani listed Spain first among the countries to which Italian artists sent pictures.<sup>33</sup> During the reign of Philip III, the Florentine royal painter Bartolomé Carducho acted as agent for the importation of paintings by Florentine contemporaries, the “Reformed Mannerists” Passignano, Sorri, and Pagani, and, probably, old master pictures too.<sup>34</sup> Other Italian painters who shipped to Spain at this time included Antiveduto Grammatica and Camilo Proccacini.<sup>35</sup> One shipment of paintings

29. The attitude that ignorant Spanish collectors would be satisfied with paintings with bright colours was expressed in Flanders in the presence of Juan José de Austria, as reported by Jusepe Martínez (ed. 1988, p. 286). In correspondence with Van Immerseel in Seville in 1631–1632, Jan Brueghel II urged the merchant to bring paintings by his father for sale to Spain, since he was sure such beautiful craftsmanship had not been seen there. If originals proved to be too expensive for Spanish collectors, copies of Brueghel’s paintings were also offered. See Denucé 1934, docs. 33 and 39.

The full extent of artistic traffic from Florence to the court of Madrid during the privanza of the Duque de Lerma has recently become clear owing to the research of Edward Goldberg in the Medici Grand Ducal Archives.

The Perception of Spanish Art in Spain

In seventeenth-century inventories and valuations of picture collections, attributions to Italian artists can frequently outnumber those to Spanish painters, whose works most probably outnumbered the former. Indeed, in the Getty Provenance Index database, there are over twice as many Italian attributions as Spanish, although 75 percent of pictures in our inventories are not attributed and one might assume that a large percentage of these are native works.<sup>37</sup> In 1600, for instance, the inventory of the collection in Granada of Licenciado Gregorio López de Madera, reputed to be an amateur artist, contained paintings attributed to the most famous Italian artists (Titian, Bassano, and Raphael), but a Flight into Egypt by a local hand was listed anonymously as by a “pintor de nombre en Granada”.<sup>38</sup> Resident artists seem to have perceived the widespread premium on imported art in the period as prejudicial to their careers. Ambitious and talented artists in Spain early in the century felt that they were undervalued, passed over by patrons in favour of foreigners for important commissions, with their easel paintings losing out to collectors’ taste for old master pictures.<sup>39</sup> Two significant commissions that went to foreigners stand out during the reign of Philip III: Don Rodrigo de Calderón’s commission of the altarpiece of the Valladolid monastery of Portacoeli from the Italian studio of Orazio Borgianni (1611), and the commission (around 1619) by Cardinal Sandoval, the Archbishop of Toledo, of three paintings from Carlo Saraceni in Rome for the sacristy of Toledo Cathedral.<sup>40</sup> It is impossible to gauge in real terms how much the prevailing taste for foreign pictures inhibited the careers of Spanish artists. However, it is significant that the court painter Vicencio Carducho spearheaded early attempts to found an art academy in Madrid on the model of the Florentine one, in order to encourage and train promising painters and thus to propagate a school of native artists.<sup>41</sup>

In a letter of 1610, Eugenio Caxés succinctly diagnosed the state of painting

41. See Calvo Seraller 1981, pp. 157–177, for a memorial from the painters to Philip III concerning the foundation of an academy. This document speaks of the “ignorance” of painters in Spain, the lack of “naturales,” and the need to cultivate painting. Among the reasons given is that the king could then choose his painters from graduates of the academy, instead of relying on painters from abroad.

in Spain.<sup>42</sup> Blame for artists' low opinion of themselves in Spain was attributed to indigenous social prejudices against their profession, public contempt, and general ignorance. It is not surprising that attempts to improve the status of painters in Spain came from Italian artists at court, including Vicencio Carducho, and those who had lived in Italy, such as El Greco.<sup>43</sup> However, the fact that lack of patronage doomed the early efforts to found a drawing academy to failure is a measure of how deeply ingrained Spanish prejudices were. Caxés also noted the provincialism of Spanish art, which he attributed to the trade deficit in favour of painting from abroad, and the fact that collectors who went to Italy did not take Spanish pictures with them. While Spanish works were exported later in the seventeenth century, this effort was negligible in comparison with the massive importation of paintings from Flanders and Italy.<sup>44</sup>

Philip IV's taste for collecting art from abroad was not caused by a dearth of native painters. Jusepe Martínez's manuscript treatise on painting written in the 1670s, Discursos practicables del nobilísimo arte de la pintura, aimed to expose the fallacy of Spanish taste for all things foreign, to cultivate a greater appreciation of "Spanish" art, and ultimately to help foster a native school.<sup>45</sup> The apparent plight of artists working in Spain is encapsulated for Martínez in Jusepe Ribera's cynical remark, in reference to his permanent exile in Naples, that "Spain is a pious mother of foreigners and very cruel stepmother to her own children."<sup>46</sup> In fact, Jusepe de Ribera would seem to have enjoyed an ideal position regarding the Spanish market. He was one of the most famous Spanish artists, whose work had all the appeal of Italian art for Spanish collectors. Living in the Spanish dominion of Naples, he was exempt from the prejudices and pressures on artists at home, while being able to export at least half of his easel paintings back to collectors in his native country. By the end of the century, the Almirante de Castilla had a room of his palace especially devoted to the works of Ribera, as well as rooms decorated with paintings by "Eminent Spaniards," such as Antonio de Pereda and Juan Carreño de Miranda, which suggests that this collector at least placed living Spanish artists on an equal footing with the great foreign names of the past.<sup>47</sup>

Jusepe Martínez amplified Caxés's complaints.<sup>48</sup> He attributed the Italians' per-

44. Martínez was concerned with artistic trade in Europe, and no mention is made of Spanish art in South America. His treatise was written before the beginnings of the export of works by famous artists such as Murillo. For the collection of the Genoese merchant and banker Pablo Justiniano, who sent some Spanish pictures and sculptures back to Genoa, see Doc. 19. The collection of Spanish paintings assembled in Madrid in the 1670s by the imperial ambassador, Count Ferdinand Harrach, is still intact in the family palace at Rohrau and would repay study.

45. Martínez's treatise takes every opportunity to deride the vogue for foreign art. One story, for instance, concerns an aristocrat who presumes to be a connoisseur buying what he thinks is a Roman painting from an auction (almoneda) for double the cost price. The fact that the painting disappoints the collector by proving to be Spanish, and one of Martínez's own works, illustrates the fallacy of associating quality and value with Italian art: "Estos desconciertos nacen de la grande ignorancia y poca fe que aquí se tiene de los mismos naturales, y mucho crédito de las naciones estrangeras". ception of the ineptitude of Spanish artists to the lack of prints after their paintings.<sup>49</sup> He also noted the irony of Spanish patrons having artists copy prints after foreign paintings rather than commissioning their own original creations, the whole world thereby denied seeing “the subtlety of their genius”.<sup>50</sup> Originality of conception in figurative histories became a vital aesthetic distinction, and in the treatises of Pacheco and Carducho the emphasis on artistic invention was linked to the liberal status of the artist, since to slavishly copy the work of another was analogous to craftsmanship.<sup>51</sup> The use of the term “original” in inventories generally distinguished paintings by the hand of a master painter from copies after another, but it may also imply that the work was an independent and unique composition.

In his treatise on painting, Antonio Palomino was aware that the uninformed viewer (“el vulgo”) did not distinguish between pictures that were copied and those invented, but that the connoisseur set a higher premium on the painter who “invented” and employed his creative intellect rather than merely copied.<sup>52</sup> Spanish theorists believed that, while an artist might justifiably use print sources during his apprenticeship, creative artists should invent rather than merely copy.<sup>53</sup> In his advice on copying from prints, however, Palomino showed some sympathy with the problems and difficulties inherent even in this relatively elementary practice.<sup>54</sup> Indeed, many Spanish painters may have regularly made copies for sale. A number of recent studies have shown the extent to which even the most talented of artists in the seventeenth century depended upon print sources for their own works.<sup>55</sup> Occasionally, inventories noted the print source for paintings; in 1657 the painter Juan Bautista Sánchez appraised the collection of Mateo Álvarez de Ferrera and his wife and noted that a Deposition was copied after a print by Van Dyck.<sup>56</sup> Flemish and Italian prints were imported into Spain in large numbers.<sup>57</sup> As well as being vital source material for practicing artists, 49. Martínez, ed. 1988, p. 255. Martínez (ibid., pp. 191–192) recounts the surprise of a Roman artist at the quality of Caxés’ altarpiece of the Martyrdom of St. Philip and Assumption of the Virgin in the Madrid church of San Felipe, confessing that he did not expect such great painters to be active in Spain and that the pictures were as good as anything to be seen in Rome.

50. Martínez (ed. 1988, pp. 220–221) did not encourage artists to copy from prints (p. 71) and spoke of Pedro Horfelin’s having to copy Flemish devotional prints for nuns and monks instead of painting altarpieces. prints were an economical form of decor in some houses, while collectors also displayed finer-quality prints as works of art in their own right.<sup>58</sup> The collector and amateur artist Gaspar de Ledesma Meriño owned a print collection in 1618 (Doc. 4), and the Duc d'Aarschot's collection included prints by Rubens and Jordaens which were valued in silver reales ("reales de plata").

Patrons and Painters

An ideal of artistic patronage from the Renaissance was that of the cultivated nobleman, instructed in art, who appreciated the elevated, intellectual calibre of painting and the artist's unique creativity. The art treatises written by Carducho and Pacheco were aimed at such individuals in Spain. Throughout the seventeenth century painters campaigned to improve their social and professional standing, and to raise their activity to the ranks of the liberal arts. Despite this, they were generally considered artisans, closer to tailors than poets, and the normal pattern of relations between them and their socially superior clients put them at a distinct disadvantage.<sup>59</sup> The social prejudices of the Spanish aristocracy, highly conscious of rank and hierarchy, may have inhibited their appreciation of native Spanish painters and smoothed the path for foreign artists. Even so enlightened and art-loving an aristocratic employer as the Duque de Lerma expected deference from his artists, and had painters of the calibre and ambition of Vicencio Carducho undertake menial painting tasks.<sup>60</sup> On the other hand, many important middle-class collectors at court, some of whose collections are documented here, and who rose through the royal bureaucracy from more humble backgrounds, may have been more open to the merits of practising painters. Some members of the ecclesiastical estate in Spain who were cultivated, sometimes well-travelled and used to dealing with artists, were also important patrons. Indeed, canons of the cathedral chapters of Toledo and Seville cathedrals were patrons and friends of El Greco and Murillo, respectively. However, the friendship of individuals such as the self-confessed aficionado Fray Felix Hortensio de Paravicino, who had his portrait painted by El Greco and wrote perceptively on painting, contrasts with El Greco's misfortunes at the hands of his corporate religious patrons.<sup>61</sup> (AHPM, Prot. 2.001, ff. 364–384, 27 July 1607). The Duke of Lerma hung framed prints at the palace of La Ribera and the ducal quarters of the Valladolid palace (Florit 1906; Schroth 1990, p. 208). Carducho (ed. 1979, pp. 179, 226) admired Albrecht Dürer's religious prints of the Passion and Apocalypse, and the evidence of seventeenth-century Spanish inventories reflects the esteem in which collector's held Dürer's prints. See, for instance, Barrio Moya 1985, p. 112, for the collection of the military captain Don Jerónimo de Soto in 1630, which included two series of the Passion by Dürer and a print of his namesake St. Jerome by Dürer in a walnut frame. Framed sets of Dürer's Apocalypse hung on the walls of Fernando de Borja's residence in 1666 (Doc. 78, nos. 7–9).

While art treatises of the period suppose an ideal of a courtly patron who unquestioningly and magnanimously rewarded artists according to their genius, this rarely corresponded with reality. Many documents relating to legal disputes over money testify to painters' frequent financial difficulties. In 1635, for instance, the young painter Domingo Guerra Coronel successfully sued a royal servant, Francisco Bandres de Abarca, for a large sum of money he was owed for one year's employment in his service painting original works of his own invention and making copies.<sup>62</sup> Don Diego de Persia, "agente e hombre de la casa de Su Majestad," had Juan de la Corte released from prison and paid off his debt of 568 reales on the condition that he or his brother Francisco de la Corte pay off the bail by undertaking any works of painting Persia demanded of them for three days every week, at a daily "salary" of eight reales and supply of canvases and food.<sup>63</sup> However, such situations contrast with the social prestige and considerable freedoms enjoyed by salaried court painters. Comparatively speaking, Diego Velázquez was immensely privileged for a painter in Spain, living in another world from the rank and file of his colleagues in Madrid, enjoying royal favour, his career distinguished by honours and court offices, and gold chains in payment for some of his paintings.

In the reign of Philip IV, The Conde-Duque de Olivares oversaw the recruitment and placing of Sevillian artists at court; he had his own painter in Alonso Cano, from 1638, the year of his arrival at court, designated pintor y ayuda de cámara to Olivares. The new king inherited the royal painters Vicencio Carducho and Eugenio Caxés from the previous reign, where they had been identified with the regime of the Duque de Lerma. Ironically, perhaps, it was their lowly status – as mere painters – that may have prevented them from being purged on the accession of Philip IV and his first minister. Among the artists who benefitted from Olivares' "Sevillian connection," Velázquez was the most powerful and influential. It was most probably Velázquez who recruited Francisco de Zurbarán in 1634 to paint a battle painting and 12 mythological paintings of the Labours of Hercules for the Salón de los Reinos of the Buen Retiro. This commission was awarded to him in spite of his being unsuited to mythological painting by experience and style, a fact that reinforced his dependence upon Flemish prints for assistance in visualizing the scenes.<sup>64</sup> Conversely, it is difficult to explain the absence from this commission of the Italian royal painter Angelo Nardi. This long-lived artist enjoyed a considerable reputation as a connoisseur; in 1644 Philip called him "my most modern painter," in spite his rather outmoded talents.<sup>65</sup> Perhaps Nardi's political connections and friendship with Velázquez, rather than his art, was enough to secure his reputation.

Unlike their Italian counterparts, who could move between city states, Spanish artists were forced to compete for work in comparatively few artistic centres – for Andalusian artists, Seville and Granada. Francisco de Zurbarán, for instance, moved to Seville from a provincial career in Llerena in 1629, and enjoyed a long and successful career. However, even he appears to have outlived his style and to have lost out to younger artists, which forced him to move to the Madrid court in 1658, as did his contemporary, Francisco de Herrera the Elder. Perhaps Zurbarán once again expected to draw on the support of his old friend Diego Velázquez, whose death in 1660 may have adversely affected his career. Although mention of Zurbarán's works in Madrid collections show that he enjoyed a degree of success among private collectors, he died in Madrid in 1664 in reduced circumstances, and by Palomino's time his works went unrecognised.<sup>66</sup> Both Díaz del Valle and Palomino were also shocked by the unfortunate reversal of circumstances in the case of talented artists they had known personally, such as Antonio Arias, a cultivated and talented artist who had been employed by Philip IV but who died a pauper in the Hospital General.<sup>67</sup> Such a miserable end can partly, if not wholly, be explained by the likelihood that his rather hard, classical style fell out of favour in the high Baroque of the later seventeenth century. A majority of potential patrons of painting, aristocrats, high-ranking ecclesiastics, the letrados of the Spanish bureaucracy, and court functionaries were concentrated at the royal court. Painters too gravitated to court as the single most important source of patronage and favour. A total of 72 painters were recorded in one survey of professions in the capital for taxation purposes in 1625, and there may have been many more journeymen artists among whom subsistence may have been endemic.<sup>68</sup>

Some aristocrats and court functionaries imitated the royal predilection for the company of painters. A few individuals whose passionate interest in art is well documented followed the custom of the Italian aristocracy of protecting artists in their own palaces. Thus the Duque de Alcalá protected Diego de Rómulo Cincinnato;<sup>69</sup> the young Antonio de Pereda was the protégé of Don Francisco de Tejada, a councillor of Castile, and was soon taken into the household of the influential Roman aristocrat and connoisseur Giovanni Battista Crescenzi, himself a painter.<sup>70</sup> Early in the century, the Duque de Lerma named Bartolome de Cárdenas his ducal painter.<sup>71</sup> Juan Bautista de Espinosa styled himself painter to the Duque del Infantado.<sup>72</sup> In the second half of the century, Juan de Alfaro was protected by the Almirante de Castilla and came to enjoy a degree of familiarity with his noble patron that Palomino found remarkable and that he likened to the relationship between Apelles and Alexander the Great.<sup>73</sup>

The protection of powerful individuals at court could make all the difference to an artist's career. In 1612, Eugenio Caxés' appointment to the post of royal painter that his father, Patricio Caxés, had occupied, was processed through the Junta de Obras y Bosques, and he obtained the office not only on the strength of his ability but also because he was recommended by the Conde de Salazar.<sup>74</sup> However, artists' reliance upon the patronage of a limited number of individuals at court, and their identification with their retinues, meant that careers could be made and lost overnight as a result of court factionalism. The consequences for artists' sudden loss of patronage, through political machinations or death, could be dramatic. Antonio de Pereda was one of the most promising artists of his generation. At the very beginning of his career, Pereda was taken into the household of Don Francisco de Tejada, councillor of Castile, and continued his artistic education by copying from fine paintings in his private collection. Pereda's career was transformed by the protection of Giovanni Batista Crescenzi, Marquis de la Torre, who secured the artist his first paintings for a Madrid church and his début at court, with the Relief of Genoa for the Salón de los Reinos of the Buen Retiro.<sup>75</sup> However, on the death of his protector in 1635, Pereda's ambitions were abruptly curtailed; he lost court favour and was never rehabilitated, and was forced to rely on ecclesiastical commissions and the production of religious subjects, still lifes, and landscapes for the private market, the conventional source of livelihood for most painters in the capital. Palomino recounts an incident in which Francisco de Herrera the Younger painted a picture satirizing the poor taste of the Conde-Duque de Olivares (a friend warned him of the dire consequences for the artist if he presented the work to him).<sup>76</sup> Palomino describes the case of Don Juan de Alfaro to illustrate the extent to which an artist's career could depend upon the protection of a single powerful individual. Despite being under the protection of the powerful Almirante de Castilla, one of the greatest collectors of his day, Alfaro made the mistake of not joining his master in his exile from court and instead went to work in his home town of Córdoba. On returning to Madrid, Alfaro again sought the protection of the rehabilitated almirante, only to find that he refused to see him. Perhaps "tainted" by his disloyalty toward the almirante and consequently unable to replace this patronage with that of another noble, Alfaro resorted to the ignominious expedient of trying to find work in the public painting shops ("tiendas de pintura") and soon died.<sup>77</sup>

Influence of Foreign Art

Despite the complaints of Carducho and Martínez, it is hard to prove in real terms how detrimental the prevailing taste for art from abroad was to the careers and livelihoods of Spanish artists. Some artists improved their chances on the home market by travelling abroad to study. Pedro de Moya was the only painter of significance to travel to the North, to study the work of Van Dyck first hand. Many more made the traditional study trip to Italy, including Luis Tristán, Juan de Jaureguí, Pedro Núñez, who became a member of the Rome Academy of St. Luke, and, of course, Velázquez.

Painters could turn to their own advantage prejudices in taste among Spanish collectors by imitating the styles of foreign artists. The pantheon of Spanish artists includes many who painted in the Venetian manner; some artists, such as El Mudo, Juan Bautista Martínez del Mazo, or Diego Polo, were considered extremely skillful imitators of Titian's style. In Palomino's biography, Angelo Nardi's paintings were said to be close to Veronese, the works of Bartolomé Román were like Rubens, and Pedro de Moya and Simón de León Leal painted like Van Dyck. The abiding popularity among collectors of the works of Pedro de Orrente, called the "Bassano español," can partly be explained by their similarity to the rustic genre mode of the Bassano family of artists, who were so admired in Spain. The Flemish background of the very talented artist Juan van der Hamen was certainly an advantage in marketing his still lifes, which many regarded as a particular expertise of northern artists. Van der Hamen painted some still lifes based on Flemish prototypes, as he did garland pictures, and thus kept pace with the tastes of collectors who were conversant with and valued art from Flanders.<sup>78</sup> Van der Hamen yearned for court recognition as a figure painter, and it is perhaps telling that the king employed him only to paint pendants for the imported Flemish fruit and flower pictures by Frans Snyders that hung in the Alcázar.<sup>79</sup>

The normative standards in Spanish taste in the period appear to have been set by the works and reputation of foreign artists.<sup>80</sup> Spanish painters were admired as they approached the styles of sixteenth-century Venetian artists, for instance, or for their ability to paint with the fluency of Rubens and Van Dyck. In his biographies, Antonio Palomino characteristically justified the achievements of Spanish artists by reference to authoritative “great” artists of Italy and the Low Countries. While this was a rhetorical strategy in Palomino’s text, it is not a recourse used by Lázaro Díaz del Valle in the 1650s and it may well reflect a tendency among connoisseurs of the later seventeenth century whose admiration for sixteenth-century Venetian old masters and deceased artists such as Rubens and Van Dyck had increased. For Palomino, then, Bartolomé Carducho’s paintings were considered so good that they seemed to be by Raphael.<sup>81</sup> A work by Eugenio Caxés looked like a Tintoretto,<sup>82</sup> a José Donoso was like Veronese,<sup>83</sup> Cristóbal de Zariñena and Herrera the Younger’s paintings could look like Titian’s,<sup>84</sup> Juan de Alfaro’s portraits were like Van Dyck,<sup>85</sup> and an Alonso Cano was like a Correggio.<sup>86</sup> While Palomino admired El Greco’s works in his earlier “Venetian” manner, he was highly critical of his later “maniera extravagante,” which Palomino interpreted as a means of expressing his originality and the uniqueness of his works.<sup>87</sup> Even more admirable were those artists versatile enough to create works that equalled a number of the acknowledged great masters. Thus, Juan Antonio Escalante made paintings that were like those of Titian and Tintoretto,<sup>88</sup> Pedro Ruíz González’s works were like Titian and Veronese,<sup>89</sup> and Juan Niño de Guevara’s portraits were like those of Rubens and Van Dyck.<sup>90</sup> Moreover, some paintings seemed to be an ideal combination of the qualities of these artists, such as Sebastian de Herrera’s Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, which Palomino believed partook of the best of Titian, Tintoretto, and Veronese.<sup>91</sup> Juan Carreño de Miranda’s portraits were distinguished for their combination of qualities of Titian and Van Dyck, which made them superior to either.<sup>92</sup> Although modern eyes may not agree with some of Palomino’s stylistic comparisons, they cannot be dismissed out of hand, since contemporaries would have been familiar with the works of most major European artists as found in the rich holdings of Madrid collections.

Artists commonly learned by the studying and copying of works in private collections – especially, if access could be secured, the masterpieces of the royal collection. The young Antonio de Pereda was set to copying the great masters represented in the collection of Tejada.<sup>93</sup> Palomino also attributed the development of Juan Niño de Guevara's style to the intervention of two early patrons, who recommended the study of foreign and Spanish masters: the Flemish Captain Miguel Manrique schooled him in the style of Rubens, and the Marqués de Montebelo, himself an amateur painter, recommended him to Alonso Cano in Madrid, who completed his instruction in the art of painting.<sup>94</sup> The Venetian paintings in court collections meant that Spanish artists could familiarise themselves with the type of “painterly” painting this school typified and which came to be so greatly admired in the later seventeenth century. Jusepe Martínez recommended copying heads from Venetian art, “que es la más suelta y más amable a la vista,” something which Rubens did when he drew heads from Titian's Poesie in Madrid in 1628.<sup>95</sup> A head also copied from one of these paintings was listed in the studio of the painter Francisco de Burgos Mantilla in 1648.<sup>96</sup> Another copy of a head from an unspecified Titian painting was listed in the inventory of the amateur artist Giovanni Battista Crescenzi.<sup>97</sup>

In a real sense, it was not imperative that artists travel abroad to see great easel paintings, since many of the best had come to Spain. As early as 1603, it was proposed that a “school” for painters be opened in the galleries of the Duque de Lerma, in which painters of the capital could benefit from “the best paintings” and sculptures of his collection.<sup>98</sup> Bartolomé Murillo, who never left Spain, travelled from Seville to Madrid to study the masterpieces in court collections, as did his contemporary Juan de Valdés Leal.<sup>99</sup> The fact, reported by Palomino, that Madrid collectors ultimately admired the works of Murillo over those of Titian and Van Dyck is a real measure of the great esteem in which this artist himself came to be held.<sup>100</sup> Diego Polo copied paintings at the Escorial, and Bartolomé Vicente is said to have spent seven years copying there.<sup>101</sup> Palomino tells how Juan de Sevilla turned himself into a follower of Rubens through his study of oil sketches of mythological subjects by the artist, when it was much more common to follow prints after Rubens' works, as did José de Sarabia.<sup>102</sup>

Palomino attributed the evolution of the style of Claudio Coello, an artist whom he knew personally, to his copying the works of Titian, Rubens, and Van Dyck.<sup>103</sup> The high-Baroque style of Spanish painters such as Juan Carreño de Miranda, Francisco Rizi, Francisco de Herrera (who travelled to Italy), and Claudio Coello was heavily indebted to their exposure to Italian and Flemish works in court collections; it could be interpreted as a form of supreme stylistic synthesis of all that Spaniards admired in the best foreign art. Thus, for Palomino, Juan de Alfaro's artistic dexterity and skill was reflected in the fact that he not only painted pictures of his own invention, but was also an admired copyist of Titian and Rubens, imitator of Van Dyck, and restorer to the Almirante de Castilla.<sup>104</sup> The 10th Almirante de Castilla, who formed one of the greatest private collections of the second half of the century (Doc. 117), dedicated rooms in his Madrid palace to the works of the most admired of foreign artists, including Raphael, Titian, Tintoretto, Bassano, and Rubens. His dedication of rooms to Ribera and Orrente and another room to the works of Eminent Spaniards, which included paintings by Pereda (Desengaño de la vida), Antolínez (The Incredulity of St. Thomas), Herrera the Younger (Christ and the Samaritan Woman), and Carreño de Miranda (Penitent Magdalene),<sup>105</sup> shows that contemporary painters of the Madrid "school" were regarded with equal admiration. Indeed, this regard could reflect a more widespread appreciation of native Spanish artists in the second half of the seventeenth century, which may have been a consequence of the development of taste and collecting during the period.

Not all of the copies listed in inventories of artists' studios like that of Francisco de Burgos Mantilla in 1648 were for study; many made a living by selling these to collectors.<sup>106</sup> A booming copying industry among painters in Madrid developed in response to the demand of many collectors for images by universally admired artists such as Titian, Raphael, Andrea del Sarto, Correggio, Rubens, and Van Dyck, among others. Some images themselves appear to have assumed a paradigmatic status; one of these was the Entombment of Christ by Titian, known as the Sepulcro; inventories of collections list many copies of the work, probably derived from the two versions in the Spanish royal collection. The Entombment by Titian in the Escorial began to generate copies almost from the time of its arrival in Spain; one, believed to have been painted by Juan Fernández de Navarrete, was placed in Francisco Fernández de Liébana's altar in the Catedral Nueva of Salamanca in 1577 and is still in situ.<sup>107</sup> From the evidence in the last will and testament of the painter Diego Rodríguez, for instance, the artist painted a copy of a Virgin by Van Dyck for the Conde de la Revilla, copied works by Correggio, Borgianni, Caxés, De la Corte, and Velázquez for Juan de Saavedra, Knight of Santiago, and wanted a copy of a St. Peter by Ribera hung in his own family chapel.<sup>108</sup> One entry in the will of Juan Bautista de Santolus concerned a copy of a Ribera painting for an unnamed collector.<sup>109</sup> Copies of works by contemporary Spanish artists were also listed in collections of the time, which could be made up of a mixture of originals and copies. In 1651, the small collection of Don Tomás de Albaña, secretary of the Cámara de Su Majestad, included works by Francisco Ribalta, Pieter van Laer, and painted sketches (“borron”) by Caxés and Veronese, as well as six copies after Titian and a copy after Correggio, copies of hunting scenes by Frans Snyders and landscapes by Francisco Collantes, and a copy of a St. Onofre by Ribera.<sup>110</sup> In the appraisal of the paintings of Antonio de Mardones in 1666, Juan Carreño de Miranda recognised copies after Titian and Annibale Carracci, but also copies after Vicencio Carducho, Eugenio Caxés, and Antonio de Pereda (Doc. 80). Frustratingly, however, many anonymous paintings in inventories were listed as “copies,” without specifying the original author; one such salient document is the inventory of the Duque de Arcos of 1693 (Doc. 118).

Carreño de Miranda's Penitent Magdalene is probably no. 93; suggested by Mallory in Palomino 1986 as being either the picture now in the Real Academia de Bellas Artes de San Fernando, Madrid, or that in the Museum of Fine Arts of Oviedo; still another possibility might be the version in a private collection in 1972 when Baretini Fernández included it in his monograph Juan Carreño, pintor de cámara de Carlos II, Madrid 1972.

Collectors’ demand for images from a recognised canon of great art probably explains the eclectic nature of some of their collections, which apparently disregard prevailing academic stylistic distinctions between drawing and colour. Such demands also meant that, despite of their own stylistic persuasion, Spanish artists might be required to copy works as diverse as those of Raphael, Fra Bartolomeo, and the Venetians. The copy was a surrogate for an admired original; for many collectors, it maintained the aura of the original image despite differences in style. Surprising as it may seem, then, Palomino admired a copy of Titian’s Danae by Antonio Mor, which he believed improved on the original.<sup>111</sup> Equally, the copies after Titian and Caravaggio listed in the studio of Bartolomé González in 1627 might be considered a surprising aspect of his activity.<sup>112</sup> Inventories only rarely specify the hand of the copyist, but examples include Antonio Ricci’s copy of a painting by Correggio of the Virgin Suckling the Infant Christ in the collection of Sebastian Díaz de Ontiveros (Doc. 26, no. 21). In his appraisal of the collection of Don Luis de Hurtado in 1658, Juan Carreño de Miranda recognised a copy of Correggio’s Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine by Angelo Nardi and copies of Titian’s Ecce Homo and Mater Dolorosa and Eugenio Caxés’s Immaculate Conception, all from the royal collection and copied by Bartolomé Román.<sup>113</sup> Carreño de Miranda’s own copy after a St. Onofre by Ribera was recognised by Palomino in his valuation of the collection of Andrés de Villarán in 1683 (Doc. 110, no. 6). We can see numerous other such examples of Spanish artists copying Italians in the documents in this publication, among them: Mazo copying Titian and Veronese, Carreño de Miranda copying Rubens, Francisco Ribalta copying Raphael, Alonso Cano copying Correggio, Carreño de Miranda copying Eugenio Caxés, Jerónimo Antonio Ezquerro copying Murillo, Francisco Ribalta copying Leonardo da Vinci, Luca Giordano imitating Filippo Napoletano, Antonio Ricci copying Correggio, Sebastián de Herrera Barnuevo copying Tintoretto, and Francisco de Burgos Mantilla copying Titian.

Francisco Pacheco recounted that in 1605 he judged a copy of a painting of Pedro de Campaña’s Crucifixion superior to the original, because, he said, the copy’s colouring was softer and more beautiful and the drawing more graceful.<sup>114</sup> The esteem in which some copies were held is reflected in the remarkably high values of some of these in estate valuations: some copies could be worth more than original paintings in the same collections. For example, a copy after Raphael was the most highly valued painting in the collection of Cristobal González Cossío in 1636 (Doc. 22); in Diego de Altamirano's collection in 1642, Antonio Puga's copy after Rubens' Wolf Hunt was also the most valuable picture in the collection (Doc. 35, no. 55). In the collection of Andrés de Villarán in 1683, Palomino valued a copy of a painting by Van Dyck as highly as an original work by this artist (and more highly than many other pictures in the collection) (Doc. 110, no. 31). In the same collection, Palomino valued Carreño de Miranda's copy after Ribera's St. Onofre more highly than another anonymous copy after the same artist.

Connoisseurship of the period set a premium on accuracy of copies.<sup>115</sup> Palomino remarked on the difficulty of copying the works of Luis de Morales, and the ease with which copies could be detected.<sup>116</sup> Carreño de Miranda was embarrassed on seeing again in the collection of Pedro de Arce a poor copy after Titian that he had painted in his youth.<sup>117</sup> But one of the triumphs of an artist's suppression of his own style in a copy is Carreño de Miranda's accurate and famous copy of Raphael's Fall on the Road to Calvary for the high altar of the Carmelitas Descalzas of Madrid.<sup>118</sup> According to Don Vincencio Juan de Lastanosa's description of his own collection in 1662, in the oratory hung a Holy Family with Angels by Guido Reni, which, the author pointed out, "es copia, pero de excelente mano".<sup>119</sup> Palomino admired Juan de Alfaro's copies for being just like originals, and the uncanny skill with which Luca Giorano imitated the styles of other artists made him famous throughout Europe.<sup>120</sup> However, Palomino reserved the greatest praise for Juan Bautista del Mazo as a copyist of the works of Rubens, Titian, and Venetian art. These were considered so good as to pass for originals in Italy itself, and painted with such "mastery and freedom" (magisterio y libertad) that they even surpassed their models.<sup>121</sup>

Spanish Taste

On his first visit to Spain in 1603, Rubens was surprised by the undistinguished nature of painting at Philip III's court, and the courtiers' inability to tell originals from copies among the pictures he had brought from Mantua. For Rubens, only the cultivated Duque de Lerma had sufficient interest in and understanding of painting to be the worthy recipient of Rubens' most ambitious and thrilling portrait to date.<sup>122</sup> Astutely, Rubens noted that Lerma's good taste was nourished by daily contact with the inherited treasures of the Spanish royal collection, which acted as a model of taste in painting throughout the seventeenth century.

In 1617, it was noticed that members of the lower nobility were beginning to decorate their rooms after the fashion of Spanish grandees.<sup>123</sup> Within 35 years of Rubens' first visit to Spain, there had developed a widespread interest in collecting paintings, led by the king and followed by noble courtiers, which became one of the most distinctive features of the reign of Philip IV. Sir Arthur Hopton, the English ambassador, noted this in 1638 on the occasion of an exchange of royal portraits between the crowns of England and Spain. When the portraits of Charles I and Queen Henrietta Maria, said to be by Van Dyck, were found not to be originals they were held in very low esteem, because, as Hopton commented, the Spanish court was "now more discerning and more affectioned unto the art of painting than they were or than the rest of the world imagines."<sup>124</sup> Hopton had probably watched with amazement the rounding up of hundreds of quality paintings for the rapid decoration of the new royal palace of the Buen Retiro.<sup>125</sup> Hopton's observation on the connoisseurship of the Spanish court is further proved by the rejection of the Ecce Homo of Ludovico Cardi, Il Cigoli (1607), sent to Madrid between 1650 and 1652 as a state gift from the Grand Duke of Tuscany for the king's privado, Don Luis de Haro.<sup>126</sup>

Florentine artists customarily exported devotional pictures to Spain, and this trade was particularly important during the reign of Philip III, whose Florentine court painter, Bartolomé Carducho, appears to have coordinated such imports and also to have dealt in Italian paintings.<sup>127</sup> During this period, a veritable flood of copies of the miraculous fresco of the Annunciation in SS. Annunziata in Florence were sent by the Medici to the Spanish court, and some examples of this famous image are listed in the documents reproduced in this volume.<sup>128</sup> On the occasion of the commission of two paintings from Florence as gifts for the Duque de Lerma's wife, the Marquesa de Denia, and the Marquesa del Valle in 1599, the Florentine agent at the Spanish court wrote a memorandum advising the prospective painters, Ligozzi and Passignano, in matters of Spanish taste. Therefore, in painting the subject of the Adoration of the Kings, the painter was advised that in Spain paintings were well received that showed a "tranquil bearing" (attitudini quiete) and without elaborations (svolgimenti) and that the depiction of the Virgin should be decent in visage (con viso honesto), with a blue mantle covering her head or at least both shoulders and above all revealing no bare feet.<sup>129</sup> In 1590 the Florentine ambassador advised a painter on the style of two pictures for the Conde de Chinchón, pointing out that "in Spain they like devotional paintings with quiet attitudes and without elaboration," with due decorum observed in the Madonna's "honest expression," and covered head, shoulders and feet.<sup>130</sup> In the painting of the Agony in the Garden, the painter was advised to observe decorum in the poses of the sleeping Apostles, sleeping "in easy and decent postures" (con attitudini commode et honeste). In the case of an altarpiece painting of the Assumption of the Virgin for the dowager Duquesa de Alba ordered from Florence in 1599, she expressed the common prejudices regarding art from abroad; Alba observed that the best painters in Italy were to be found in Florence and showed a disdain for native painters in saying that "nothing done with the brush here in Spain would turn out right” (vendría conforme).<sup>131</sup> Strictures in her instructions included beautiful faces, effects of relief, and a brake on the display of too much of the painter’s art. In 1604 Bartolomé Carducho wrote a note clarifying Alba’s requirements which included showing the Apostles in “good and easy poses (in buone attitudini, et facile) and with faces observed from life, pleasing colour (vago colorito) and beautiful, devout faces (volti belli et devoti).<sup>132</sup>

At the beginning of the seventeenth century, José de Sigüenza criticised a desire for excessive sweetness and “veiled” suavity in Spanish painting.<sup>133</sup> The paintings and repaintings at the Escorial by the mediocre artist Juan Gómez was driven by Philip I’s overriding concern with propriety and orthodoxy in religious painting, but also epitomised for Sigüenza in 1605 an aspect of Spanish taste in religious art, pleasing and of much devotion, and which was painted with sweet and smooth colours (“el gusto de los españoles que aman dulzura y lisura en los colores, harto apacible y de mucha devoción”).<sup>134</sup> Indeed, for Sigüenza, the spiritual dimension of religious representations was paramount, and his adamant belief – following the opinion of the painter Juan Fernández de Navarrete – that “the saints must be painted in such a way that they do not take away the desire to pray, but inspire devotion” surely found an echo among many collectors in the first quarter of the seventeenth century.<sup>135</sup> When Bernini was in France in 1665, he satirized the apparent naiveté and literalness of a Spanish patron who commissioned an ex voto from a painter in Naples.<sup>136</sup> His telling of the story, however, would appear to reflect the extent to which Italians underestimated the importance of an unambiguous representation of the subject matter, and the priority of pictorial veracity over beauty, for instance, in the minds of Spaniards.

This taste may help to explain the success on the Spanish market of the paintings of Marcello Venusti, a Mantuan follower of Perino del Vaga, “perche il suo modo di dipingere era assai devoto, diligente, e vago,” in the words of his biographer Giovanni Baglione.<sup>137</sup> Indeed, paintings of the Holy Family attributed to “mateo de marçelo” in the collection of the Duque de Lerma<sup>138</sup> and his sister, the Condesa de Lemos (Doc. 11), confirm a taste for his paintings among collectors at the court of Philip III. In his Life of the sixteenth-century painter Luis de Morales, “El Divino,” Palomino mentioned that the devotional qualities of this artist’s images meant that they were still commonly placed in oratories, which is supported by at least one seventeenth-century inventory from Madrid (Doc. 8).<sup>139</sup> However, in the case of religious paintings for the galleries of discerning private collectors of the calibre of Don Luis de Haro, it was not enough that these should inspire devotion and be well painted. In the opinion of the Florentine ambassador in Madrid in 1650–52, Cigoli’s Ecce Homo ran the risk of demeaning both giver and recipient, since its author was considered a minor Tuscan artist in Spain and the painting itself was simply not good enough.<sup>140</sup> Angelo Nardi, the Italian-born royal painter and respected connoisseur at court, said that since the Cigoli was a modern painting it would not have held its own against the Italian old master originals being sought by the king and aristocratic collectors.<sup>141</sup> In short, it was not deemed to be worth anything, since by this date in Madrid only the best old masters and the best moderns would do.

In the context of a heightened awareness of what constituted good taste in Spain, José Antolínez conceived his genre painting known today as the Poor Painter (Fig. 1), a humorous inversion of Velázquez's Las Meninas (Fig. 2). Perhaps the painting makes an ironic reference to the abiding issue of the liberal status of painting in Spain by representing the opposite social extreme to that to which artists aspired. Antolínez was notoriously proud and vain, well known for his biting, sarirical wit.<sup>142</sup> The painting could be an ironic self-portrait, like Luis Tristán's earlier self-portrait showing the artist as a poor pícaro.<sup>143</sup> The setting is the studio of a young painter, who stands in a doorway in the background, and who appears to enjoy a degree of complicity with the viewer. Prints displayed on the studio wall would have functioned as artistic aids and could have been copied on request.<sup>144</sup> Perhaps there is a reference here to the plight of native Spanish painters who were forced to manufacture reproductions of popular foreign models. Apparently the client rather than the young painter is satirized in the painting. The picture does seem to articulate the plight of artists grubbing a living by painting simple devotional images for poor, unenlightened patrons, even picture dealers. Such an "enslavement" to the popular market is implicitly contrasted with practitioners of the liberal art who are given commissions more suited to their talents and the dignity of painting. This artist's client is ragged and clearly poor, a peasant from out of town or a picture dealer perhaps, who grins stupidly and hawks a small devotional image at the viewer. This is a copy of Scipione Pulzone's Madonna with a Rose, a painting which by this date may have appeared old fashioned and naive to the sophisticated audience of connoisseurs to whom Antolínez appealed in his painting.

Antolínez's own picture may be read as a pictorial equivalent of the stories and jokes that pepper Palomino's biographies and the texts of Jusepe Martínez in the 1670s. Antolínez may have been satirizing a kind of kitsch of his day, images which were popular but of little real artistic value in this artist's eyes. The Pulzone picture may therefore stand for the mass of piously sentimental devotional images produced by the legion of humble "madonnieri" painters who worked in Madrid. A popular, "low" taste of the artisan class for simple devotional images of relatively little aesthetic merit would appear to be mocked here.<sup>145</sup> However, seventeenth-century Span-

145. The predominance of religious subject matter in paintings owned by members of the lower classes in Madrid and their "taste" for devotional images of the Virgin is analyzed by Bravo Lozano (1981), who found that the most popular were the Virgen de la Soledad and the Immaculate Conception. A study of Sevillian collection inventories by Martín Morales (1986, pp. 146–148) also found that the incidence of religious and devotional paintings increased the lower down the social scale. This did not preclude the popularity of important works among the lower classes, of course. Lavinia Fontana's Holy Family with the Infant St. John at the ish inventories characteristically list large numbers of apparently mediocre religious pictures that nevertheless satisfied the devotional needs of their owners, who could even include some discerning and prominent individuals.<sup>146</sup> Two paintings owned by the Duque de Lerma, for instance, were inventoried in his collection as “malo aunque devoto”.<sup>147</sup> An early example is the the collection of the Patriarch of Valencia, San Juan de Ribera (d. 1611), whose collection comprised some 350 pictures, mostly of devotional subjects, and included a picture by Pulzone. As the surviving works in the Colegio del Patriarca show, the majority of these were pious representations of very modest artistic quality.<sup>148</sup> The diffusion in Spain of the Pulzone Madonna represented by Antolínez is proved by the existence of a number of copies.<sup>149</sup> One of these was painted by Blas de Ledesma. Two other anonymous copies are in the Prado Museum and Huesca Cathedral.<sup>150</sup> Two copies of this painting were listed in the studio of Francisco de Burgos Mantilla in 1646.<sup>151</sup> Paintings that appear to have been copies of this image were listed in the 1619 inventory of Jusepe Bolero, Contador of the Conde de Casarubios, and the Condesa de Lemos in 1628.<sup>152</sup> The image of Virgin of the Rose is listed frequently in seventeenth-century inventories, and the extent of the market for the type is reflected in the “seis ymaxenes de las rrossas” which Francisco de Morales agreed to paint among a lot of 100 paintings for sale by another artist in 1610.<sup>153</sup>

A culture of connoisseurship and exclusive good taste made it possible to mock the ignorance of those who did not possess a real understanding of art.<sup>154</sup> Only an audience who could discriminate between good art and bad provincial painting was equipped to fully enjoy the humour of one episode in Doctor Jerónimo de Alcalá Yáñez’s picaresque novel Alonso mozo de muchos amos, el donado hablador (1625–26). Here, the eponymous hero, who has been identified with the young man in the background of Antolínez’s painting,<sup>155</sup> is apprenticed for six months to a painter in Toro. The author jokes about an Immaculate Conception whose symbols are difficult to read even with their “labels,” a painting in which St. Jerome’s lion looks like a domestic cat (“gato, aun no tan malo, cerca voy para que sea león” exclaims the artist), and paintings of saints whose hands are so badly rendered that it would require a miracle

146. Morán Turina (1991–1992, pp. 170–171) argues that many individuals in the period were simply unable to discriminate aesthetically between good and bad paintings. He also notes that among the reasons for their owning pictures should be considered the attractiveness of colour, the name and reputation of the artist, fashions for certain themes, the significance of the subjects represented, and, of course, the devotional requirements of the client and collector.

Taste for Venetian Painting

Spanish connoisseurs esteemed Venetian painters above all others. The works of this school, particularly those of Titian, exemplified the aesthetic value of colorido, or colore in the familiar parlance of Italian theoretical writing.<sup>158</sup> The art treatises of Vicencio Carducho and Francisco Pacheco, however, elevated dibujo (Italian diseño) as the supreme artistic value and Pacheco advocated a high degree of finish (“acabado”) in painting.<sup>159</sup> The style of painters admired at court during the reign of Philip III, such as Bartolomé and Vicencio Carducho, Eugenio Caxés, and Bartolomé González, is in accordance with a drawing-based art promoted in the treatises of Carducho and Pacheco. The principle of drawing was the foundation of humanistic “learned painting” (docta pintura), suitable for elevated religious and historical subject matter and characterised by its scientific and ideal qualities. It was argued that this could be appreciated only by cultivated connoisseurs who possessed a real understanding of the liberal art of painting. In contrast, the debate associated the use of colour with an appeal to the senses and the vulgate.<sup>160</sup>

The ideal art postulated in theoretical texts was inconsistent with the admiration for Venetian painting among people of taste in the first part of the seventeenth century. This fact may have been of little significance to most connoisseurs, who were eclectic in their tastes and who collected art irrespective of the academic contradiction between the values of drawing and colour. The status of Venetian painting in Spain meant that Spanish connoisseurs had been long accustomed to attending to the facture and finish of paintings.<sup>161</sup> Despite the Tuscan bias of Carducho’s treatise, even he asserts that painterly painting in the Venetian manner is more worthy of admiration than a polished and finished manner, in this respect differing dramatically from the opinions of Pacheco, and Jusepe Martínez satirizes a “prolix” style, overburdened with detail.<sup>162</sup> But only the connoisseur could appreciate the skill involved in this style and be able to distinguish between good and bad paintings made in this way. An awareness of the potential of painterly painting, so-called manchas and borrones, probably increased by the middle of the seventeenth century in response to the innovations evolved by Velázquez, a new kind of “sketchy” painting made up of economical blotches of pigment and open brushwork. By the mid-seventeenth century, an expectation of spontaneous, painterly handling of colour, deriving from Spanish experience of Titian’s work, was an established alternative to the admiration for detail, the creation of smooth surfaces with blended brushstrokes and high finish that typified Spanish taste earlier in the century. And this neo-Venetian aesthetic eventually reigned supreme in Madrid in the second half of the seventeenth century.

The optical style of painting exploited by Velázquez in its most consummate form was regarded as deriving from Venetian art, and was appreciated by Spanish connoisseurs in analogous terms for conferring on the painted image both verisimilitude and beauty.<sup>163</sup> Such paintings could not be appreciated according to the conventions of drawing that underlay the art of the court painters of the reign of Philip III. In painterly paintings the facture, open brushwork, and seemingly random blotches of colour made different demands on the eyes and the intellects of viewers and led to the development of another form of exclusive connoisseurship. Thus, Fray Hortensio Félix de Paravicino, an admirer of El Greco, distinguished between seeing and looking at a painting, thereby raising the issue of the viewer's informed perception and appreciation of art. With Venetian-style painting, it became particularly important to know how to look and, for instance, how to judge the proper distance and the correct lighting conditions for pictures. Thus Paravicino advised examining paintings from a proper distance in order to appreciate their full illusionistic effect, to find the point at which the blobs of pigment resolved into a naturalistic image: "examinar de lejos; cosa que ha introducido en los aficionados a este gran arte mirar y juzgar en las distancias las valentias" (1640).<sup>164</sup> He also explained the necessity of looking at Venetian painting in its right light; otherwise it would appear a mess ("una batalla de borrones").<sup>165</sup> Francisco de Quevedo referred to this idea in praising the "manchas distantes" of Velázquez's optical style of painting.<sup>166</sup> And when discussing colour, Jusepe Martínez illustrates the importance of viewing conditions for painterly painting by the instructive story of one artist's paintings looking "finished" only when set up in the respective positions in the chapel for which they were designed.<sup>167</sup> However, it is also the case that cabinet paintings for the galleries of private collectors and even miniatures were painted in a neo-Venetian painterly style by the most admired artists in Madrid in the second half of the seventeenth century. This suggests that among connoisseurs, there developed a widespread admiration of the painterly style for its own sake, in which the handling of the pigment and colours was of primary visual and aesthetic appeal.

Where a free, open execution was considered suitable to express the artist's imagination and creative genius, a tight style was associated with those who merely copied from nature.<sup>168</sup> This latter approach Jusepe Martínez characterises negatively as "prolix" and "pedantic," and cites the case of Lupicini, a Florentine artist in Zara-

Martínez (ed. 1988, pp. 90–91) tells how, on seeing the pictures close to, the patron complained of the pictures being unfinished and sketchy ("no esperaba ... de sus manos obra tan basta, y poco concluida, pues todo es borrones"). The artist promised to finish the pictures within a month. Without any retouching at all, however, he hung the works in their place in the chapel. The fact that the patron was duly astonished at the way in which the artist had seemingly improved the pictures in so little time illustrates his lack of understanding of the requirements of the site and proper viewing conditions for art. McKim-Smith (1988, p. 21) also notes this story, which may derive from topoi in Italian writing about art from the time of Vasari.

goza, who became celebrated among the vulgate for his highly detailed and punctilious paintings.<sup>169</sup> In Palomino's Life of Juan Carreño de Miranda, provincial religious clients in Pamplona are disappointed that they cannot "see" the subject in the artist's open brushwork, until the local artist Vicente Berdusán obligingly explains the true artistic worth of the picture.<sup>170</sup> Jusepe Martínez relates an instructive story about the annoyance of a mother who could not "see" in sufficient detail the Flemish lace worn by her daughter in a portrait commissioned from Velázquez.<sup>171</sup> The point is not so much a contrast between the earlier style of court portraiture and the style of Velázquez, since artists such as Antonis Mor and Alonso Sánchez Coello occupied positions of the highest prestige for seventeenth-century connoisseurs. Rather, it underlines how Velázquez's innovations in optical painting could be fully appreciated only by an elite of sophisticated aficionados of painting who understood the merits of this style.

The Royal Collection and Taste for Venetian Painting

For the individual collectors who made up the stratified, aristocratic society of the Spanish seventeenth century, the Spanish royal collection represented the paradigm of good taste, in which was enshrined the esteem of Titian and Venetian art. The Emperor Charles V had knighted Titian, and he and Philip II had been the artist's most distinguished patrons. Venetian painting continued to occupy a privileged place in the affections of Spanish Habsburg monarchs. The Escorial effectively became a great museum of religious painting, in which Philip IV augmented its holdings of Venetian pictures donated by his grandfather, as well as adding works by Rubens and Van Dyck.<sup>172</sup> Religious paintings, mythologies, and portraits by Titian and other Venetian artists were also prominent in the pictorial decoration of the Madrid Alcázar and Pardo palace.<sup>173</sup> It was, therefore, perfectly in keeping with this traditional admiration of Venetian art that Lázaro Díaz del Valle should include a biography of Titian, as well as Rubens, in his notes on painting at mid-century, and that these painters appear in Palomino's Lives of the Spanish Artists (1724).<sup>174</sup>

Venetian painting, and particularly the work of Veronese, was highly valued as the decoration of princely halls throughout Europe in the seventeenth century and the currency of princely exchange, admired for its sheer visual splendour, colour, sensuality, and legibility from a distance. The Spanish Crown owned the largest holding of Venetian sixteenth-century masterpieces outside Venice, which enjoyed great international renown. By 1686, there were a staggering 77 Titians in the Madrid Alcázar alone.<sup>175</sup> In Vicencio Carducho's "guided tour" of the royal collection, published in his Diálogos de la pintura, the works of Titian were listed, and singled out as the most highly regarded pictures, "las más estimadas de todas," and a highlight of the visits of foreign dignitaries.<sup>176</sup> A number of Philip's grandees demonstrated their loyalty to the crown with gifts of Venetian paintings: one such was the Marqués of Leganés, who had received two Titian portraits from the king, and later presented him a number of others from his collection.<sup>177</sup> Among the Titians that Philip IV acquired from the sale of the English royal collection were pictures that he himself had given to Prince Charles in Madrid in 1623, such as the portrait of Charles V with a Hound (Prado, Madrid). One he did not reacquire, however, was Titian's Venus and Antiope, the so-called "Pardo Venus" (Louvre, Paris) that he had given to the Prince of Wales in 1623, possibly because of its profane subject matter. This was despite the fact that the picture had been saved from the disastrous Pardo fire in 1604 and which, for Philip III, redeemed the loss of all of the other masterpieces of the portrait collection.<sup>178</sup>

By the seventeenth century, ownership of so many famous Titian paintings reflected the prestige, even the greatness, of the monarchy. Titian had portrayed Philip's great ancestors, the Emperor Charles V and Philip II, who had ruled Spain when it was at its most powerful. In the Hall of Mirrors of the Madrid Alcázar, the ruling king Philip IV received embassies before Titian's equestrian portrait of Charles V at Mühlberg, brought from the Pardo at the beginning of his reign, a clear declaration of dynastic continuity and the Spanish king's role of defender of the Catholic faith. Philip II's famous mythological pictures by Titian, the poesie, were considered appropriate gifts for the Prince of Wales on his visit to Madrid in 1623, and were crated up and ready to leave Spain, saved only by the cancellation of his marriage to the Infanta. At the end of the seventeenth century, king Charles II personally intervened to prevent the loss of Veronese's Christ Among the Doctors (Prado) from the royal collection, by arguing that it was an integral part of the decoration of the Alcázar's Hall of Mirrors and consequently inalienable royal patrimony.<sup>179</sup>

In the seventeenth century, Titian's religious paintings at the Escorial continued to serve the devotional needs of the Spanish Habsburgs.<sup>180</sup> Some of the famous, prominently displayed Venetian paintings of the royal collection also maintained a political and programmatic meaning, as was clearly the case with Titian's Allegory of Philip II and the Battle of Lepanto (Prado) and Spain Coming to the Aid of Religion (Prado). These pictures hung in the Hall of Mirrors and may have influenced the conception of Velázquez's lost history piece of the Expulsion of the Moors for the same room, which contained a personification of Spain alongside a portrait of Philip III. Titian's set of Twelve Roman Emperors, bought from the collection of Charles I of England and hung along with portraits of Habsburg royals in the Alcázar's Galería de Mediodía, set an ancient imperial tenor to the exaltation of the dynasty.<sup>181</sup> Philip II's state room in the Alcázar, called the Sala de las Furias, was named after the four large paintings by Titian depicting the four eternally condemned mortals in Hades: Tityus, Sisyphus, Tantalus, and Ixion, who had defied the gods. Philip IV hung these in the New Room (later Hall of Mirrors), where they probably maintained their admonitory significance and where, for instance, the eagle eternally gnawing at the liver of Tityus could have appeared an emblematic lesson in the punishment of transgressors of Habsburg authority.<sup>182</sup>

During the seventeenth century, however, the Venetian pictures of the royal collection became regarded primarily as museum masterpieces, admired for their aesthetic qualities rather than purely for their devotional or emblematic meanings.<sup>183</sup> Philip IV inherited pictures that his ancestors had acquired from Titian himself and that counted among the most famous in the world. One such picture was Charles V's Gloria (Prado), which Philip II had transferred to the Escorial, where it was one of the monastery's main attractions and where the painter Luis Tristán thought it was worth more than the whole palace put together.<sup>184</sup> Philip IV also actively continued Habsburg tradition by adding more Titians to the Spanish royal collection. Among his most celebrated acquisitions were the Bacchanal of the Andrians (Prado) and the Worship of Venus (Prado) given to the king by Nicolo Ludovisi, Prince of Piombino, which were brought to Madrid in 1638 by the returning Viceroy of Naples, the Conde de Monterrey, who himself owned a fine collection of Venetian paintings. Even at the end of his life Philip IV continued to seek works by Titian. In 1664, he made his last major acquisition of old master paintings from the collection of the Genoese general, the Marquis Giovan Francesco Serra. Of the 40 paintings in the lot, half were by sixteenth-century painters and 10 were Venetian. These included another version of Titian's Venus and Adonis, and a version by Annibale Carracci painted in emulation of Titian.<sup>185</sup>

One brief autograph statement of Philip IV regarding the acquisition of pictures bluntly reveals his priorities. In 1645 Philip instructed his agent in London, Alonso de Cárdenas, to acquire paintings from the collections of Charles I and the Duke of Buckingham, telling him simply to buy "only originals by Titian, Paulo Veronese or other esteemed old masters".<sup>186</sup> In 1649, Velázquez's mission in Italy also involved the buying of Venetian old masters, which were the most sought-after paintings of the king and his agents.

Although the Madrid Alcázar lacked a picture gallery built specifically for the purpose, the collection of paintings and works of art in the Galería de Mediodía, for instance, effectively made it a collector's gallery.<sup>187</sup> Indeed, most of the fine paintings hanging throughout the palace were displayed primarily for their visual and aesthetic qualities, and the relative importance of their authors. The sheer numbers of Philip's Titians allowed the king the unique luxury of "specialist" hangs in the Alcázar. The bóvedas de Ticiano was an area of the Alcázar so named in the seventeenth century from the mythological paintings by Titian that hung there.<sup>188</sup> This was a suite of 15 ground-floor rooms in Philip IV's summer apartments at the northeast corner of the palace, which gave onto a small, intimate "secret garden" where the king sought respite from the Madrid summer heat. In 1626, when Cassiano dal Pozzo visited the suite, six rooms were decorated with Titian's Ovidian poesie for Philip II and other mythologies, the Tarquin and Lucretia (Cambridge, Fitzwilliam Museum) and royal portraits.<sup>189</sup> In this essentially intimate and private area of the palace, the king's recreation appears to have involved his admiration for these supreme examples of Titian's profane subjects.

Visitors fortunate enough to visit the bóvedas could not fail to be impressed by the overwhelming display of painted nudes in the mythological pictures that made the suite famous. When Cassiano visited the rooms in 1626, Titian's poesie hung in pairs throughout the suite and comprised the most famous series of erotic mythologies by the artist considered to be the greatest master of the painting of human flesh, especially that of women. At the sight of the painting of Diana and Acteon (Edinburgh, National Galleries of Scotland) Cassiano was stupefied by Titian's skill in this respect, noting in his diary "non si può cred<sup>re</sup> la morbideza di quelle figure".<sup>190</sup> He also noted the custom of covering all of the paintings depicting nude figures when the queen passed through the apartments.

After the visit of Rubens in 1628, Philip redecorated the apartments with paintings by Rubens and Flemish masters, with the last room of the suite devoted to Titian.<sup>191</sup> The window in this room faced east and opened onto the small orchard garden, the Jardín de la Priora, and in 1636 was described as the room to which Philip retired after eating. The king brought together in this room the series of his grandfather's mythological poesie, and hung his two "new" Ludovisi Titians here, along with Titian's Reclining Venus with a Dog (Prado) and a lost Venus and Cupid by the artist. Titian's Rape of Lucretia was also displayed here, perhaps owing to a perceived parallel between the theme of the "loves of the gods" and the sexual violence of this historical subject. The general theme of the nude meant that Titian's Adam and Eve (Prado, Fig. 3) was not out of place here and it was entirely fitting that Rubens' Three Graces (Prado), a monumental erotic fantasy that Philip purchased from the artist's own collection on Rubens' death in 1640, should also hang in this suite.<sup>192</sup>

Rubens himself had felt entirely at home in the bóvedas in 1628 and is said to have made copies of most of the Spanish royal Titians, which he took back to Antwerp to nourish him for the rest of his life. Pacheco's list of copies is headed by four of Philip II's poesie, the Venus and Cupid, and Adam and Eve.<sup>193</sup> This must have been a profoundly reinvigorating experience for the Flemish master, then at the height of his powers, in which he drank deeply from the Venetian sources of his art. After Rubens' death in 1640 Philip bought some of these Titian copies, which he had probably watched being painted over twenty years before, among a lot of 29 pictures acquired from Rubens' estate by private sale and hung them at the Pardo.<sup>194</sup> For a connoisseur of the intelligence and sensitivity of Philip, the excitement of these pictures lay in their ideal combination of two of the artists he most admired. In some cases Rubens "improved" the original, as Palomino noted, by changing the composition,

192. Philip's continued interest in the decoration of the bóvedas is suggested by the fact that he caught cold here while supervising the hanging of works in winter 1658, as familiarly reported in Velázquez's letter to Camillo Massimi. as with Titian's Adam and Eve (Figs.3 and 4) The Rape of the Europa was perhaps beyond improvement. However, even in this case, as with all the other copies by Rubens, the Flemish artist changed and modernised them through his own neo-Venetian style, facture, and luminosity.<sup>195</sup> Rather than purely copies, Rubens' versions invoke Titian in seventeenth-century terms. It was perhaps Rubens' copies more than anything else that reawakened painters and connoisseurs' interest in "sketchy" painting.<sup>196</sup> Indeed, it is these paintings, perhaps more than the original Titians, which Spanish court artists regularly copied, that were most influential for the painterly high-Baroque style of Madrid painters of the second half of the century.

The sixteenth-century Venetian paintings in the royal collection had a profound and lasting effect on the development of art and taste in the seventeenth century.<sup>197</sup> While the paintings of Titian were consistently and widely admired by cultivated Spanish artists and connoisseurs, many painters of rank in the first half of the seventeenth century continued to practice a prevailing "Spanish" style of high finish and detail. The high status in Spain of Venetian old masters was not enough in itself to cause a radical change of style. It has been noted above that the Spanish theorists of art Carducho and Pacheco held up the work of Titian as a paradigm of colorido, but they adhered to Tuscan theoretical values, which elevated the importance of drawing over colour. Carducho and Caxés, and their many pupils at the Madrid court, therefore, propagated a style of painting oriented toward the values of disegno over colore, in the language of debate current at the time.<sup>198</sup> The influence of sixteenth-century Venetian paintings was probably strongest when the contemporary painting of Velázquez, and imported works by Rubens and Van Dyck, awakened the "new" aesthetic of painterly painting in Spain.<sup>199</sup> It is perhaps this which explains the fact that the general trend in painting at court of the period toward a neo-Venetian, high-baroque style developed in the later Seventeenth century, rather than the fact that in the second half of the century more collectors sought Venetian paintings or that more artists may have had access to the paintings in the royal collection.

The royal collection appears to have acted as a normative model for the collecting of art in seventeenth-century Spain, and royal pictures were regarded as paradigms of good and proper taste.<sup>200</sup> Palomino noted that the paintings by Titian in the royal collection and in the homes of collectors in Spain were too numerous to list.<sup>201</sup> Standards in taste were set by the king, were shared by his aristocracy and the highest echelons of society, and were in turn widely followed by individuals from more modest backgrounds. In the sixteenth century, Antonio Pérez directly imitated Philip II's collection of paintings by Titian.<sup>202</sup> In 1603 the Duque de Lerma owned an original painting by Titian, and 19 copies after Titian, including some of the works from the royal collection.<sup>203</sup> The Marqués del Carpio had Miguel Colonna fresco a gallery of his palace with a fictive collection of paintings by famous masters, including Titian, Raphael, Rubens, Van Dyck, and Velázquez.<sup>204</sup> Juan de Piña's novel, Casos prodigiosos y cueva encantada, describes the house of Don Antonio de Sotomayor at El Espinar, whose gallery contained copies of Titian's mythological paintings and other works in the Alcázar's bóvedas de Ticiano.<sup>205</sup> Imitation in matters of taste was to be expected in a hierarchical, pyramidal society in which the king was the focus for the aspirations of the many at court and the ultimate source of favour, distinction, and revenue. Shared cultural values in fact manifest individuals' adherence to the monarchical-seigniorial social system of which they were a part.

198. Thus it was perfectly possible for Carducho to be chosen to restore and enlarge Titian's allegories for the New Room of the Alcázar in 1625 (Orso 1986, pp. 45–46) or for a painter such as Bartolomé González, working in a tenebrist style with tentative naturalism, to paint copies of the Titians in the royal collection (Cherry 1993).

Taste for paintings among court collectors in seventeenth-century Spain appears to have been remarkably conformist. The documents presented in this volume represent only a fraction of the large number of pictures attributed to Titian and his Venetian contemporaries in seventeenth-century inventories, and this phenomenon of the reproduction and dissemination of royal works throughout Madrid collections is symptomatic of the conservative, imitative taste of the period. Most of these "Titians" were school works and copies that endorsed the royal canon of good taste. Copies after the famous originals by Titian in the royal collection were always in demand among collectors of all classes, even permeating down to comparatively modest homes, and perhaps retaining something of the "aura" surrounding works owned by the Habsburg monarchs.

A painting by Titian was at the centre of a scandal concerning the royal architect, Juan Gómez de Mora. In 1636, Gómez de Mora, who had earlier been accused by Juan Bautista Crescenzi of stealing a Titian from the royal collection and replacing it with a copy, was relieved of his palace duties. In his apology to Olivares, the architect blamed his own ignorance, without elaborating on the nature of this lapse, and in his defence claimed to have removed the picture only in order to have a copy made for the prominent lawyer, Don Lorenzo Ramírez de Prado. However, he was disgraced, as was Ramírez de Prado for receiving the picture, and the incident necessitated the appointment of a new apostentador and an inventory of the Alcázar collection.<sup>206</sup> The incident was seen as a fraudulent abuse of Gómez de Mora's office of apostentador and ayuda de la furriera, with responsibility for palace furnishings, and the gravity of the offence may have been all the greater given that it involved a royal Titian.

On the home market discerning and affluent collectors pursued a limited number of old master paintings by more orthodox means, especially pictures which were sold out of collections by public almoneda. Out of necessity, many collectors made do with copies. Copying represented an elementary stage of artistic education and was considered a relatively menial activity for professional master painters in the business of producing original works of their own invention. However, in the memorial for the foundation of an academy presented by Madrid painters to Philip III ca. 1619, it was recommended that a special certificate be given to graduates of the academy who only wished to copy; realistically speaking, it appears to have been necessary for the livelihoods of many painters in Spain.<sup>207</sup> The studios of master painters usually included a number of apprentices and oficiales to whom copying tasks could have been delegated.<sup>208</sup> There were professional copyists, who were usually affiliated with the studio of another master and who were held in very low esteem by the artistic establishment.<sup>209</sup> However, the thriving market for copies among collectors meant that it was a lucrative practice to which even artists of the distinction of Juan Carreño de Miranda regularly turned; it was possible to attain a high reputation as a talented copyist, as did Juan Bautista Martínez del Mazo and Juan de Alfaro.

At the lowest end of the market would have been copies of copies, and the low values of some of these must reflect the poor aesthetic quality of reproductions that brought the originals down to the level of kitsch. Copies from black and white prints may also have been common; these may have captured something of Titian and Rubens' invention, if nothing of their colour and facture. In 1598, the royal painter Juan Gómez agreed to make for Don Gaspar de Hínestrosa an Annunciation, copying it from a print after Titian.<sup>210</sup> Matias Ximeno's copy of Titian's St. Margaret, painted for an altarpiece at Pastrana in the 1630s, reverses the image and bears so little relationship to the facture of the original that it must derive from Luca Bertelli's well-known print after the work in the Spanish royal collection.<sup>211</sup>

Given the prevalence of copies on the art market, there appears to have existed a highly developed connoisseurship of copies in the period.<sup>212</sup> Jusepe Martínez, for instance, speaks of the Fleming Pablo Esquert, brought to Spain by the Duque de Villahermosa, who became famous and rich for making small and full-size copies of Titian's paintings, painted in the "delgada y muy gentil" Flemish style.<sup>213</sup> Artist-valuers frequently identified copies in collections and sometimes remarked on the quality of these. In 1618, Gil Ramírez de Arellano's pride in the quality of his Titian copies was noted in his inventory (Doc. 3). Francisco de Burgos Mantilla, himself a copyist, remarked that a painting in the collection of Antonio Carnero in 1662 "appeared to be by Titian," that one of his two pairs of copies of the Ecce Homo and Dolorosa was better than the other, and that a copy after Rubens was "well done" (Doc. 72, no. 47). Palomino recounts an occasion when he and Juan Carreño de Miranda were looking at paintings in the home of Pedro de Arce (Docs. 38 and 75, see also Docs. 66 and 82), and studying a "copia muy indigna" of Titian's St. Margaret from the Alcázar collection, which Carreño de Miranda admitted was an early work of his own.<sup>214</sup>

Unfortunately, Palomino does not say why the copy was so execrable, but it was a salutary example of bad art to all present. Then, as now, according to Fray Felix Hortensio de Paravicino, an aficionado of painting portrayed by El Greco, the difficult activity of connoisseurship in distinguishing originals from copies was based on close stylistic analysis of the artists' "manera de pintar". Although the original is prized over the copy, he admits that the best copies are those that are hard to distinguish from originals, "tan puntuales y tan efectivamente trabajadas de una mano valiente".<sup>215</sup> One of the most intriguing "mistakes" in attribution was Velázquez and Nardi's rejection

He was to copy all he was asked to do and even to travel outside Madrid, probably to the Escorial. of Correggio's Education of Cupid ( Fig. 5) as an original worthy of the royal collection, mentioned above.

The demand for high-grade reproductions of royal pictures was monopolised by royal painters. These were artists who were able to exploit the cachet of their position and, in the best cases, could work directly from the originals in the royal collection to produce "official" copies. These reproductions, in turn, conferred ever greater esteem on the originals. On his death in 1627, the studio inventory of the royal portraitist Bartolomé González listed copies of some of the most famous works by Titian in the royal collection.<sup>216</sup> While these may have been for the artists' own education, it is also likely that they served as models for reproduction. As with Antonio Mor and Alonso Sánchez Coello before him, González's own tight style was clearly not an impediment to such an activity.<sup>217</sup> Juan Bautista del Mazo was the most distinguished copyist of paintings in the royal collection, and his full-size, expensive copies of royal Titians and Rubens are documented in the very best collections of the day, including that of the Marqués del Carpio (see Docs. 49, 109, 114 and 115) and the Duque de Arcos (Doc. 118). His copies after Rubens' mythologies at the Torre de la Parada appear on the background wall in Velázquez's Las Meninas (Fig. 2). Mazo's copies were greatly admired for their closeness to the original image and Titian's facture. Palomino said that they would pass for originals even in Italy, where some of them may have been exported, and even went as far as to say that they surpassed the originals. He was equally enthusiastic about Juan de Alfaro's copies after Titian, which are unknown today.<sup>218</sup>

Collection inventories in Spain sometimes list copies of Titian's portraits, but more often these are of his religious subjects and profane paintings, particularly Philip II's poesie. It is possible that Spanish collectors sought copies of Venetian and Flemish mythological paintings from the royal collection because they sidestepped the problematic depiction of the female nude, discussed below. Thus, Juan Sánchez Cotán, an artist who became a lay Carthusian monk, painted a copy of Titian's Rape of Europa.<sup>219</sup> Effectively, the Venetian copy followed an existing image that was itself sanctioned by its royal provenance. It is worth noting that copies of Venetian mythologies were the sole representations of the nude in some picture collections, such as Cristóbal González Cossío's copy of Veronese's Birth of Venus in his inventory of 1636 (Doc. 22, no. 3).

The proliferation of copies after Titian's religious paintings was perhaps even greater in the period. While Titian's religious paintings were admired in the seventeenth century for their aesthetic qualities, their devotional function was also paramount; they were regarded as naturalistic images which were powerful inspirations to devotion and prayer.<sup>220</sup> In 1634 Francisco de Tejada, for instance, willed that an Adoration of the Kings by Titian from his collection (mi Galería) form part of the ensemble of pictures in the altarpiece of his chapel in the Jesuit Colegio Imperial in Madrid.<sup>221</sup> Palomino mentions that Titian's paired paintings of the Ecce Homo and Mater Dolorosa, which were in the private oratory of the Alcázar in the early seventeenth century, were much copied.<sup>222</sup> This is supported by the numbers of such copies listed in inventories of private collections in the seventeenth century. Other much reproduced religious paintings by Titian were the Entombment and St. Margaret from the Escorial. Some of these copies could be among the most distinguished pictures in collections, such as Francisco Prado Bravo de Mendoza's copy of Titian's Gloria (Doc. 48, no. 4), valued by Angelo Nardi and Juan Bautista Martínez del Mazo at 1,400 reales.

The normative nature of this taste among the picture-collecting classes throughout Spain is illustrated by the early example of the Sevillian collector, Don Melchor de Maldonado, treasurer of the Casa de Contratación, which regulated Spain's trade with its American colonies.<sup>223</sup> Maldonado's select collection comprised 54 pictures, the best pieces of which were Venetian originals and copies, as well as pictures by Navarrete (subject unspecified), El Greco (St. Francis), and Cambiaso (St. Jerome).<sup>224</sup> The document specifies that the Venetian paintings – originals and copies, and an Adam and Eve by one Gregorio Passano, and four landscapes (“quatro liencos de lejos originales ecelentes”) – were sold as a lot to the Marqués del Aula for the large sum of 4,050 ducats.<sup>225</sup> It is perhaps significant with regard to Maldonado's conservative taste that none of these were mythological subjects. Six paintings were listed as Titian originals (Entombment of Christ, Tribute Money, Ecce Homo, St. Margaret, St. Casilda, and a Portrait of Rosa Soliman). The Entombment of Christ was confirmed as an original Titian by Luis Tristán, who had seen it.<sup>226</sup> Maldonado also owned six Titian copies: a painting of a Turkish lady, The Four Condemned from the royal collection (Tantalus, Tityus, Sisyphus, and Ixion), and a copy of the Allegory of the Marqués del Vasto (Paris, Louvre), nicknamed “the ball of Titian” (“otro que llamase de la bola copia de ticiano”) from the glass sphere depicted in the painting.<sup>227</sup> This latter painting had been acquired by the Prince of Wales in Madrid in 1623 and was copied by Bartolomé González before 1614.<sup>228</sup> Maldonado also owned a copy of a Tintoretto painting of St. John the Baptist, an original Veronese of Noah's Ark, and paintings by the Bassano family. His collection represented an important holding of Venetian paintings to which artists in Seville may have had access at the beginning of the century. His six original paintings inventoried as works by Bassano the Elder, or Jacopo Bassano, were famous in Seville and were mentioned by Pacheco, who particularly admired the painting of the Flood.<sup>229</sup>

222. Palomino (ed. 1986, p. 51) mentions these, as well as a lost half-length Mary Magdalene at the Escorial, of which there were many copies; this observation is borne out by the evidence of seventeenth-century inventories. For these paintings, see Checa 1994, p. 247, no. 4; p. 249, no. 9.

225. The total value of Maldonado's collection was a staggering 53,116 reales. This Marqués de Aula was probably Adán Centurion y Córdoba, III Marqués del Aula (1582–1658), whose palace at Estepa contained an important collection of Roman antiquities and whom Pacheco (ed. 1990, p. 217) described as an amateur painter. Some of the Italian paintings may have been acquired in Madrid, where Maldonado was in 1593, and some through the offices of the Tuscan royal painter, Bartolomé Carducho, who imported Italian works via Florence. Carducho also copied Venetian paintings for a living, and Maldonado had evidently commissioned from Carducho copies of a set of Twelve Months after Francesco (II) Bassano, for which the artist was paid in 1596.<sup>230</sup> In the context of this taste for Venetian artists among aristocratic collectors, it is worth citing a document of 1593 in which Don Francisco de Mercado y Peñalosa, a citizen of Segovia, commissioned the painter Diego Pérez Mexía to copy twelve pictures of the Twelve Months (3 x 2 varas in size) in the collection of Don Pedro de Medici at the court of Madrid. The contract specified that these were to be painted from the originals themselves, rather than copies of them, and were to be as good as a set of copies by Mexía in the collection of Don Carlos de Eraso.<sup>231</sup> Although the name of Bassano is not mentioned, the document suggests the means in which shared taste for paintings was disseminated among collectors through copies. A number of Bassano paintings were later listed in the collection of Don Francisco de Eraso, Conde de Umanes in 1635, including an Agony in the Garden, which was probably copied from the famous painting from the royal collection at the Escorial (Doc. 21, no. 14).

A widespread admiration for the Bassani as painters of religious histories, especially nocturnal scenes, is reflected in the large numbers of copies of these in Spanish collections in the seventeenth century.<sup>232</sup> Two of the most popular were the Crowning with Thorns and the Descent from the Cross painted as night scenes, which hung in the Escorial sacristy.<sup>233</sup> Giorgio Vasari had been very dismissive of the maniera piccolola of Jacopo da Ponte Bassano (ca. 1518–1592), mentioned in his life of Titian. However, in his annotations to this passage, El Greco launched into an impassioned defence of his colouring in small-scale paintings and calls him the best painter of animals, adding “y así todo el mundo pretende imitarle”.<sup>234</sup>

Paintings of the Bassano “type” were extremely popular in Spain, and copies of their paintings were also common in private collections, as inventories show.<sup>235</sup> Sometimes in these documents, the paintings of Jacopo Bassano’s sons are distinguished from his own.<sup>236</sup> Sometimes the Bassano name was given in the inventories in lieu of the pictures’ subject. This suggests that this was akin to a “label” for a type of

The artist was to receive 40 ducats for each of the copies. It is also worth noting that Antonio Ricci had opened a workshop in Madrid by 1582, when the Archbishop of Valencia bought Ricci’s copy of Leandro Bassano’s Lazarus and Dives. picture which was easily recognised and popular in Spain, comprising Old Testament subjects painted in a pastoral mode with animals and religious subjects in the form of night scenes, landscapes and rustic genre scenes and allegories of the Seasons, Months, and Elements. The skill with which the Bassano family painted animals was widely admired, and many copies of Bassano rural subjects and Noah's Ark are listed in Spanish inventories. Paintings of the seasons and the months by the Bassani were among the most widely copied pictures in Spain, and their quality must have been extremely variable. Some of these were listed among the series paintings decorating La Ribera, sold to Philip III by the Duque de Lerma in 1606, and they remained popular decorative images throughout the century.<sup>237</sup> A routine practice of Madrid painters may well be reflected in a document of 1620 in which a painter Bartolomé Sanz contracted with Don Alonso de Perea to paint an Annunciation, a St. John, four landscapes with hunts, and four Seasons by Bassano (“lienços del tiempo del bassa” [sic]).<sup>238</sup> The studio of the court painter Angelo Nardi in 1623 listed works attributed to the Bassano, which clearly influenced his style of painting, and many other painters at court must also have made copies of Bassano prototypes for sale to collectors.<sup>239</sup> Only occasionally, however, were these copies attributed in collection inventories.

Pacheco thought Bassani paintings easy to imitate.<sup>240</sup> However, the expertise of the Bassani in animal painting was universally recognised and was acknowledged by Pacheco as well as a host of artists and connoisseurs.<sup>241</sup> In his own marginal note to Vasari's comments on the Bassani, Luis Tristán concurred with El Greco's opinion and further exposed the fallacy of the Vasarian disegno-colore polarity for Spanish tastes. He recalled that during his time in Rome (1606–1611) Bassano was held in the highest esteem, since an unnamed nephew of Paul V had placed a Bassano picture “en un salón lleno de todos los mayores ... recibido por el mejor quadro de todos,” and voted so by all members of the Academia de Disegno.<sup>242</sup> This is matched by Philip IV's hanging of a Forge of Vulcan by Bassano in the Alcázar's Hall of Mirrors, the showcase for masterpieces from the royal collection, or the Almirante de Castilla dedicating a whole room to their paintings in his own palace (Doc. 117, ff. 52v–57v).<sup>243</sup>

Throughout the seventeenth century, Bassano paintings continued to be highly valued by connoisseurs and collectors, and inventories list large numbers of copies. Indeed, the enduring popularity of the Bassani among Spanish connoisseurs accounts for the highly successful career of Pedro Orrente (1580–1645), the “Spanish Bassano,” who had worked in the Bassano studio. Sometimes their works appeared together in the same collection, as in the case of the paintings of Don Pedro Pacheco in 1662 (Doc. 71). It was actually a form of praise to suggest that in the collection of Don Suero de Quiñones in the later seventeenth century, paintings by Orrente were said to pass for Bassanos.<sup>244</sup> It is, however, an oversimplification to suggest that the success of Orrente's paintings with collectors depended solely on their similarity to Venetian prototypes. While Orrente's paintings of Old Testament subjects with small figures and genre settings derived from a type made familiar by the Bassano family of painters, his works were never pastiches and have their own distinctive qualities. The appearance of Orrente's paintings with large figures in Spanish collection inventories throughout the seventeenth century also suggest that he was among the most consistently admired and valued Spanish painters. Orrente's works of the Bassanesque type were also in turn copied and inspired their own imitations from the hand of Cristóbal García Salmerón (ca. 1603–ca. 1666).<sup>245</sup>

Aficionados of Painting

The period saw the rise of a type of enlightened individual who enjoyed a reputation as a connoisseur, an aficionado, or entendido de la pintura, one who was able to discriminate in the matter of paintings and who fully appreciated the aesthetic pleasures afforded by them.<sup>246</sup> Of course, many individuals continued the traditional pattern of patronising artists for devotional images for chapels and oratories, and may never have formed private collections of paintings to any significant degree. Tomás Fermat, for instance, a secretary in the Consejo de Aragón, placed a large San Orencio signed and dated by Pedro Núñez in 1623 in the altarpiece of his chapel in the church of San Lorenzo, Huesca.<sup>247</sup> However, his postmortem inventory of 1641 shows that his Madrid residence did not hold a distinguished picture collection.<sup>248</sup> Many of these gentlemen of good taste were cultivated individuals from non-aristocratic sections of society who shared a common interest in and understanding of painting. Indeed, Palomino claimed that in his home town of Córdoba, anyone who did not own a painting by Antonio del Castillo could not call himself a man of good taste (“buen gusto”), implying a considerable conformity of taste.<sup>249</sup> One of the most important was Pedro de Arce, whose collection is discussed below (Docs. 38 and 75, see also Docs. 66 and 82). Another was Lázaro Díaz del Valle, royal chronicler (Coronista general de Su Majestad) and singer in the Royal Chapel. In his testament, Díaz del Valle ordered that his tomb be decorated with a Pietà by Antonio Arias painted in 1658 and a Resurrection of Lazarus by Juan Antonio de Escalanate of 1669.<sup>250</sup> His apparent disregard of a stylistic clash between the works of two artists he admired perhaps reflects the catholic tastes of a true connoisseur. Díaz del Valle was an intimate friend of Velázquez and appears to have known personally some of the artists whose biographies he wrote between 1656–59, such as Juan de Ricalde, Eugenio de las Cuevas, Jusepe Leonardo, and Antonio Arias; he was also a friend and a confessed admirer (“aficionado”) of the work of Antonio de Pereda, whom he knew from his beginnings in Madrid.<sup>251</sup>

The terminology Díaz del Valle used to characterise the works of painters in Madrid may offer us some clues as to ways in which contemporary connoisseurs discriminated between the skills and stylistic qualities of artists in the mid-seventeenth century.<sup>252</sup> In his biography of one of his favourite painters, Antonio Pereda, Díaz del Valle expressed particular admiration for two of the artist's early works: the Relief of Genoa (Prado), in which he noted especially the colouring of the draperies and heads, and the Vanitas (Vienna, Kunsthistorisches Museum) which, he claimed, "is everything the art of painting can achieve" and especially appreciated for its naturalism and fresh touch ("muy al natural, tierno y fresco"). Indeed, Pereda's works exemplified a painterly manner that was clearly to the connoisseur's taste and that he associated with the Venetian school ("su dibujo, disposición y pincel es de la escuela veneciana").<sup>253</sup> Other artists in the biographies also possessed analogous qualities of handling and style for Díaz del Valle; Jusepe Leonardo painted with freshness and softness ("Pintó con mucha frescura y suavidad"),<sup>254</sup> Don Francisco Caro composed his figures well and his style was "sweet and soft" ("su modo de pintar es dulce y blando"),<sup>255</sup> and Don Simón de León Leal, who was a follower of the style of Van Dyck, painted with a fresh touch ("con mucha ternura y frescura").<sup>256</sup> For Díaz del Valle, Juan Antonio de Escalante possessed great natural talent and showed particular gifts for colouring ("grande natural, en particular, ingenio en el colorir"), as well as excellent draftsmanship ("buen dibujante").<sup>257</sup> Antonio Arias was characterised as a draughtsman ("de excelentísimo Pronto y valiente dibujante") and his works were distinguished for their lively colour and firm contours ("Su manera de pintar es vivísima con admirable colorido alegre y bien perfilado").<sup>258</sup> More obscure, however, is his characterisation of Arias as a painter of "long brushes" ("pintor muy diestro y de largo pincel"), as is his remark on the "elegant brushes" ("elegantes pinceles") of Juan Bautista del Mazo.<sup>259</sup> For Díaz del Valle, some artists possessed an admirable balance of qualities, especially combined skills in colour and drawing, the "parts which make up good painting," which included Pedro Orrente, Juan de Roelas, Diego Polo.<sup>260</sup> In the case of Juan Carreño de Miranda, however, Díaz del Valle highlights only his colouring as a much praised and envied quality of his style, which is also the distinguishing feature of the style of Diego Polo.<sup>261</sup> Antonio del Castillo is characterised as a great painter and "draughtsman-colourist" ("gran pintor y dibujante colorista"), with equal skills in drawing and colour, like Pedro de Raxes the Elder.<sup>262</sup> Eugenio Caxés displayed a range of skills in a single painting of the Finding of the True Cross, which showed his abilities in drawing and colour and other aspects of the "science" of art, such as composition and perspective ("en la disposición, dibujo, colorido y perspectiva es admirable").<sup>263</sup> However, the most lavish praise is reserved for the talents of Francisco Camilo, whom Díaz del Valle described as one of the most gifted ("aventajados") painters of Spain: a great draughtsman and colourist, whose style is sweet and fresh; a painter who is aware of the “scientific” aspects of his art, such as proportion and measure; a great narrative painter who is well informed of mythological subjects, and one who is able to paint on both a large and a small scale.<sup>264</sup>

Vicencio Carducho’s Diálogos de la pintura (Madrid 1633) and Francisco Pacheco’s Arte de la pintura (Seville 1649) were important in the formation of a clientele whose patronage and support was essential to the livelihoods of artists and the development of painting. Both authors argued that cultivated gentlemen should understand and perhaps even practise painting.<sup>265</sup> In this way, the noble, and liberal, art of painting was cast as an appropriate pastime of the socially elevated. They also cite prominent contemporaries who were amateur artists. This group was headed by King Philip IV himself and members of the royal family, hailed as the very model of enlightened protection and patronage of artists, and included some prominent aristocrats, such as the Duque de Alcalá and Conde de Tula, knights of the military orders and even members of the royal household and administration.<sup>266</sup> Giovanni Battista Crescenzi, Roman nobleman, architect, and amateur painter, was at the Spanish court from 1617 until his death in 1635, and was a recognised connoisseur of painting who himself painted still lifes and promoted Antonio de Pereda and Juan Fernández El Labrador.<sup>267</sup>

Although Carducho mentioned that the gentleman Don Francisco Velázquez Minaya, Cavallerizo de la Reina, was an amateur painter, his postmortem inventory of 1657 listed all his paintings anonymously.<sup>268</sup> The 1618 inventory of the jurado of Baeza, Don Gaspar de Ledesma Meriño, listed one of his own paintings, a Head of Christ (Doc. 4, no. 66). Carducho also claimed that the royal Council of Castile was full of aficionados of painting, including Don Francisco de Tejada, whose “discreto Museo” testified to his “afecto a este Arte, y su acertado entendimiento”.<sup>269</sup> His “guided tour” of so many private collections of art in the capital is the first of its kind in a Spanish treatise. Carducho recounts the names of collectors in classical antiquity and the high prices they were willing to pay for works of art.<sup>270</sup> Likewise, his list of prominent contemporary collectors, noble and non-noble alike, emphasises the importance of such individuals for the prosperity of art and its practitioners in the capital, and serve as exemplars to other readers of his treatise. Later, in the Lives of Antonio Palomino, the names of aristocratic and non-noble patrons and collectors appear in the biographies of artists they supported or collected. Among these non-noble individuals, mention is made of Don Francisco Mezcorta, “muy aficionado a la pintura,” who owned a famous Martyrdom of St. Sebastian by Don Sebastian Muñoz; <sup>271</sup> Pedro de 267. Carducho (ed. 1979, pp. 420–421) cited Crescenzi as an important amateur in Madrid of his own time. Pacheco (ed. 1990, p. 206) said that Crescenzi and Juan Bautista Mayno, both “de gran conocimiento en la pintura,” were judges of the competition of the royal painters for a painting of the Expulsion of the Moors in 1627. In 1627, a significant lawsuit led by the royal painter Vicencio Carducho was won by painters at court against a 1 percent sales tax on their products.<sup>276</sup> The wider significance of the painters’ victory was the implicit recognition that theirs was a liberal rather than a mechanical art, that painters were like poets rather than artisans. The lawsuit must have focused the attention of the court on painting early in the reign of Philip IV. The support of important individuals at court contributed to the success of the painters’ campaign, and the statements of those who testified in their favour were printed as an appendix in the first edition of Carducho’s Diálogos de la pintura of 1633.<sup>277</sup> A revealing new document records the names and opinions of a further six of these aficionados who rallied to the painters’ cause.

The document is a notarised testimony (“información”) of Carducho’s lawsuit drawn up by Andrés Carreño, alcalde of the Valladolid painters guild and Cofradía del Glorioso San Lucas.<sup>278</sup> All six witnesses attributed the success of the painters’ lawsuit of the previous year to the intervention of King Philip IV, and two witnesses stressed that he not only understood painting but practised it. Somewhat improbably, Antonio de Araoz claimed that in 1627 all of the Spanish nobility petitioned the king in favour of the painters’ case. Two of the witnesses were gentlemen-courtiers with access to the king who must be numbered among those connoisseurs who were committed to the liberal status of painting. Don Fernando de la Hoz was 32 years old and Gentilhombre de la Casa del Rey, who ended his testimony by saying that he had been brought up with painters. The oldest and most distinguished witness was Don Gerónimo Fures y Muñoz, 52 years old, Knight of the Order of Santiago, Gentilhombre de la Boca de Su Magestad and a member of the Supreme Council of Italy. He swore with his hand on the cross of his habit of Santiago, that he was “muy aficionado a la pintura” and knew all the masters who practiced at court. In his brief testimony he merely stated that he had been amazed at the attempt to tax painters in 1627, since the art is “muy noble” and has always been “muy Preballegiada y estimada” by all of the kings of the world.

Judging from the evidence of the inventories of the private collections of other councillors, it appears that an interest in painting was not unusual among members of the Council of Italy.<sup>279</sup> Fures y Muñoz in particular may have been an important and influential supporter and promoter of painting among the courtier class in the reign of Philip IV. Carducho warmly praised Fures y Muñoz as an exemplary friend of painting. He also mentioned he was an amateur artist, with a taste for emblems, and also recounts a visit to his collection of Italian drawings. Prince Charles visited his collection in Madrid in 1623 and was given eight paintings and gifts of arms.<sup>280</sup> Many years later, at the great age of 83, Fures y Muñoz testified in favour of Velázquez's knighthood in 1659, and said that he had known the artist since 1629.<sup>281</sup>

The witnesses, in order of appearance, were as follows: Pedro del Río Troyano, who lived in the house of the painter Antonio de Monreal, Alonso Carbonel, Aparejador Mayor de las Obras Reales, Don Fernando de la Hoz, Gentilhombre de la Casa del Rey, Antonio de Araoz, Don Gerónimo Fures y Muñoz, of the Consejo Supremo de Italia, and Juan Gómez de Mora, Trazador y Maestro Mayor de las Obras de Su Magestad.

Two witnesses to Andrés Carreño's testimony were royal architects, Alonso Carbonel and Juan Gómez de Mora. Gómez de Mora was the son of of the painter Juan Gómez (d. 1597), who had worked at the Escorial, and himself had learned painting with Bartolomé Carducho. Eugenio Caxés praised his "muy grande conocimiento del arte de la pintura" ca. 1620, and he had been a central figure in Carducho's lawsuit.<sup>282</sup> Gómez de Mora's contribution to the 1628 document is a humanistic definition of the liberal art of painting, a "ciencia de tanto honor y estima" which is "arte noble y menesteroso para El culto divino y que alcanzado a fuerza de estudio y de ynxenio y Por tal a sido estimado en todas Las partes del mundo y honrrado Los Profesores della ansi en Ytalia Como por Los ss<sup>as</sup> Reyes de Castilla".

Gómez de Mora was Aposentador del palacio and directly responsible for royal furnishings, including the collection of paintings. It was Gómez de Mora, in fact, who accompanied Cassiano dal Pozzo on his tour of the Alcázar in 1626. Not surprisingly, he himself owned a painting collection; such a taste for pictures may not have been altogether unusual among the many individuals who were directly attached to the royal household.<sup>283</sup> Carducho, for example, mentions the collection of a guardajoyas, Don Jerónimo de Villafuerte Zapata, whose palace was visited by the Prince of Wales in 1623.<sup>284</sup> While Villafuerte's collection inventory is unknown, Hernando de Espejo was another prominent courtier of the reign of Philip III who was made Cavallerizo de la reina and Guardajoyas de Su Majestad (Doc. 23). Given Espejo's close involvement with the royal household in his capacity of guardajoyas, it was natural that he should turn to salaried royal painters for his own collection. The inventory drawn up on his death in 1637 includes a Crucifixion painted by Pedro Guzmán and Virgin Suckling the Infant Christ by the royal portraitist Bartolomé González. Indeed, on 14 February 1620, Espejo paid 3,200 reales to González for nine pictures, including six saints (SS.

Bernardino, James, Luis as Bishop, John Capistrano, Julian, and an unidentified saint) and three portraits, one of Espejo himself, and two others of his first wife Ana Maria de Bustos and his second wife Catalina de Maldonado.<sup>285</sup> These full-length portraits of Espejo and his wives, along with one of his father-in-law, Don Juan de Maldonado, were inventoried in 1637 at Espejo's casa de campo at Olias (probably Olias del Rey in the province of Toledo). The pictorial decoration of this property recalls the Duque de Lerma's La Ribera at Valladolid from the beginning of the century. It is telling that Espejo also owned a copy of the miraculous Annunciation from S. Annunziata, Florence, which was one of Lerma's most important works and in keeping with the devout taste of Philip III's reign.<sup>286</sup>

However, the case of José Nieto (d. 21 July 1685), Aposentador y tapicero mayor de la reina, is a salutary one. Nieto is thought to be the sitter in Velázquez's Portrait of a Man at Apsley House and was immortalised in the doorway of Las Meninas. While we might expect Nieto to have had a strong interest in painting, his postmortem inventory does not support this view.<sup>287</sup> He owned a half-length portrait of Philip IV as a young man, but no portrait of the queen or himself.<sup>288</sup> His small collection included religious subjects, some of which were large works and two were torn canvases, landscapes of the Seasons, six paintings of Sibyls, and still lifes. No works were attributed in the inventory and, judging from this document at least, Nieto's collection does not appear to have been distinguished in any way. It is worth noting here that the collection of documents at the Getty Provenance Index includes references for a large number of individuals whose social position, court occupation, or professional qualifications might imply an interest in collecting paintings, but whose inventories do not substantiate this.

The Importance of Non-Aristocratic Collectors

The ongoing publication of inventories of picture collections has emphasised the importance of the collections of the non-aristocratic classes in seventeenth-century Spain. The inventories of gentlemen-courtiers, court functionaries, merchants, silversmiths, and religious presented in this volume reinforce this finding. The royal chaplain Don Juan de Fonseca (d. 1627) owned Velázquez's Water Carrier at the beginning of the reign of Philip IV and Don Pedro de Arce (1607–aft. 1678) was the owner of one of Velázquez's most sophisticated late paintings, The Fable of Arachne (1658), which has suggested for some time now that non-noble courtiers were able to acquire the most distinguished paintings from contemporary artists. Vicencio Carducho recounts the names of exemplary collectors of classical antiquity who were willing to pay high prices for works of art they desired, and lists those of his seventeenth-century Spanish peers who were distinguished collectors of art.<sup>289</sup> While the contemporary models for such enlightened conduct were the king and his grandees, some other individuals of lesser social standing were distinguished by their protection and patronage of artists, and as collectors of paintings. Some of these men, Juan de Fonseca included, were themselves amateur painters, an activity sanctioned by the practice of the Habsburg royal family; many of their names are immortalised by those literate painters who promoted the liberal status of their profession: Pacheco, Carducho, and Antonio Palomino.<sup>290</sup> Beyond these, there was also a vast majority of anonymous non-aristocratic private individuals (particulares) who bought paintings from the studios and shops of local painters, who relied on the patronage of these men for their livelihoods.<sup>291</sup>

While the document suggests that the portrait of Espejo and his second wife was a single image, this is contradicted by the evidence of the inventory of 1637, when four paintings were listed hanging at Olias del Rey.

289. Carducho, ed. 1979, pp. 299–300.

Lázaro Díaz del Valle, chronicler to Philip IV, wrote biographies of contemporary artists at court (1656–59) and knew many of them personally. In his notes, he confessed himself to be an admirer of the painting of Antonio de Pereda and was a protector of Juan Francisco de Escalante. He also clearly knew the owners of good examples of the works of Madrid artists, citing an outstanding picture by Eugenio Caxés of the Finding of the True Cross in the collection of the Contador Obregón and Diego Polo's famous Fall of Manna (Fig. 6) owned by a notary Alonso Portero, this painting alone showing him to have been an important patron of artists.<sup>292</sup> Portero is also documented in 1643 commissioning an Annunciation from Antonio de Pereda to form a pair with another painting of the Adoration of the Kings by the same artist in his private collection.<sup>293</sup> Like most collectors at court, Portero also acquired paintings in estate sales; in 1639, for instance, he paid 800 reales for four pictures of the Four Seasons from the collection of Don Juan de Quiñones y Prado.<sup>294</sup> It is unclear to what extent Portero typified an enlightened non-aristocratic clientele. Rather than forming collections of paintings as such, many individuals may have invested in only a few high-quality pictures, usually of religious subjects. The inventory of Licenciado Pedro Miguel de Ysar in 1651, for instance, listed only one attributed painting, a Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine by Antonio de Pereda, among an otherwise undistinguished number of works; this may have been entirely typical of many small collectors of the time.<sup>295</sup>

While many individuals like Portero may have commissioned works directly from artists, the relative scarcity of notarised contracts for single paintings suggests that cli-

290. For amateur artists, see Pacheco, ed. 1990, pp. 213–233 and Díaz del Valle ed. 1933, pp. 334, 338–341. Carducho (ed. 1979, pp. 417ff) mentions amateurs among collectors whose houses are visited by the Maestro and Discípulo.

291. The number of artists whose works are cited in “casas particulares” is telling in this respect. Many of these may never have won a commission for a public work, such as an altarpiece. Thus, Díaz del Valle cites works by Francisco Caro (ed. 1933, p. 386) in private collections and those of Manuel de Molina (ibid., p. 373). Palomino (ed. 1986, p. 110) said that there was no notable painting in public by Pedro de las Cuevas, although there were many in private houses, and also noted the importance of the private market for Antonio de Contreras (p. 133), Francisco Varela (p. 145), Pedro de Obregón (p. 146), Bartolomé Román (p. 148), Angelo Nardi (p. 151), Don Francisco de Caro (p. 208), Sebastián Martínez (pp. 209–210), José de Ledesma (p. 227), Andrés de Vargas (p. 237), Francisco de Palacios (p. 246), Francisco Solís (p. 272), and Antonio de Castrejón (p. 307).

292. Díaz del Valle, ed. 1933, p. 343, who also cites a St. John the Baptist and St. Roque and a St. John the Baptist by Polo, which Palomino (ed. 1986, p. 136) also mentions in Portero's collection.

Universidad de Valladolid*, 1966, p. 432, citing AHPM, Prot. 7.672, ff. 492–492v, Madrid, 29 October 1643. The contract stipulated that the form of painting was entirely the choice of the artist, but must merit the satisfaction of two painters nominated by each of the parties, be finished in 10 months' time and cost the patron 550 reales. The contract also mentioned 2,000 ducats that Pereda apparently owed Portero for four framed paintings Portero gave to the artist, listed as Judith, St. Susanna, St. Roque, and St. Anton, which reflects extensive dealings between the two.

294. AHPM, Prot. 4.484, unfoliated. Quiñones y Prado's inventory was drawn up on 15 May 1639, and his paintings valued by Jerónimo Márquez on 22 May. Portero bought the Four Seasons along with a bed at his sale on 20 October for 2,000 reales.

ents' orders were often verbal, with the transaction recorded in both parties' account books, the libro de memoria referred to in many artists' testaments. Although rare, notarised direct orders from non-noble clients to artists are not unknown; two significant examples concern the painter Francisco de Collantes, who was known as a landscape specialist and who relied on the private market for his livelihood. In 1628, Collantes received payment from Don Francisco Merchant de la Cerda for a painting of the Assumption of the Virgin and contracted to paint a pair of landscapes with figures for him.<sup>296</sup> These paintings were listed among his remarkable collection of paintings by contemporary Madrid artists in 1662.<sup>297</sup> In 1632, Collantes contracted with another client, Don Francisco de la Hoz Villegas, to paint for him paintings of St. Jerome and St. Peter.<sup>298</sup>

In the litigious society of the Spanish seventeenth century, recourse to notaries was more common when an agreement was broken, and both parties showed remarkable willingness to sue one another.<sup>299</sup> The merchant Juan de Segovia, for instance, sued Juan Carreño de Miranda over an agreement of May 1647 for a large painting of Belshazzar's Feast. Since this painting was more than a year late, the artist and patron drew up a document specifying an extended delivery date. Assuming that Carreño de Miranda's finished work was the large painting now in the Bowes Museum, Barnard Castle, which is dependent upon print sources for figures and setting, the clause in the agreement emphasising that the picture was to be an original by Carreño de Miranda appears to have referred only to the execution, rather than the conception, of the work.<sup>300</sup>

Artists' wills can provide a revealing index to their range of activities for a private clientele, when these list the names of individuals whose accounts were outstanding at the time. The clients listed in Eugenio Caxes's will of 1634 are, not surprisingly, from the upper echelons of society; thus the artist painted an apostolado for Don Alonso de Arias, a Christ Appearing to the Magdalene for Don Diego de Abarca, many paintings for Don Jerónimo Muñoz, and for the Conde de Osorno a St. Anne, for which the parties agreed on the high price of 3,000 reales, and a painting on copper of

By this document, Collantes agreed to repay Merchant de la Cerda a loan of 220 reales and a further 59 reales that he had overpaid him for “un lienzo de nuestra ss<sup>a</sup> de la asunzion con los doce apóstoles” (2½ x 1½ varas). He was also to paint him “dos liencos de dos paysses uno de Ruinas y otro de Arboles y Penas” (2½ x 1½ varas) “que Cada uno tenga su ystoria diferente hechas de mi mano a satisfacion y Contento del dho fran<sup>o</sup> de la cerda”. The paintings were to be completed within two months and were to cost 40 ducats for the pair. Collantes was unable to sign the document, and his age was given as twenty-four years.

298. On 18 January 1632, Collantes contracted with Don Francisco de la Hoz Villegas to paint a St. Jerome and a St. Peter (1½ varas), within one and a half months, for 300 reales. This document bears the comparatively crude signature of the artist (AHPM, Prot. 5.248, unfoliated). Curiously, when, a year later, Collantes appraised the small number of religious paintings left on the death of one Francisca González de Sepúlveda (widow of Pedro González de Sepúlveda, Inquisitional notary) he did not sign the document as he said he could not write. AHPM, Prot. 5.956, ff. 1–14v, with paintings at ff. 8v–9, 29 December 1633. These are the only known archival documents directly relating to this artist published to date. The presence of Collante's paintings in many inventories of private collections testifies to his popularity among collectors. In the inventory of capital of Diego Fernández, a linen draper, in 1633, for instance, a large painting of the Nativity by Collantes was said to have cost him 300 reales. Francisco de Herrera was sued by a silversmith Diego de Segura over a painting of David (Agulló y Cobo 1978, p. 77), and there was a lawsuit between Francisco Palacios and one Jerónimo González over a painting of St. John in 1647 (Ibid., p. 125). In 1669, the painter Pedro de Obregón sued his client Don Joseph Lariz for a substantial amount of money which he owed for unspecified paintings (Ibid., pp. 119–120).

the Martyrdom of St. Stephen “de gran estudio y trabaxo,” all of which may have been commissioned works.<sup>301</sup> In many cases, popular devotional images, such those of the Immaculate Conception and St. Francis, were painted on speculation, and their sale did not necessitate any contractual agreement between painter and his client.

Many individuals who patronised artists and collected pictures, to a greater or lesser extent, formed the courtier class in Madrid and were frequently educated letrados who held palace appointments and offices in the administration. In a drive against corruption, Philip IV attempted to have all officeholders draw up an inventory of their estates, which would have provided a fascinating cross section of their tastes.<sup>302</sup> Men such as these numbered among the connoisseurs of the capital, the entendidos de la pintura of the court. Early in Philip IV’s reign, Carducho had claimed that the Council of Castille was full of aficionados of painting, men like Don Francisco de Tejada, a councillor of Castille since 1619 and the first protector of Antonio de Pereda.<sup>303</sup> The recent exhaustive study of this institution by Janine Fayard has demonstrated that indeed its members included some significant collectors and patrons of art. Fayard documented the estates of 27 councillors of Castille between 1623–1752, 17 of which contained significant collections of pictures and included works of contemporary masters.<sup>304</sup> The documents reflect the diverse scope and quality of collections and the eclectic tastes of individual owners, who identified with a particular social class rather than a particular bureaucratic institution.

Almonedas ensured that paintings circulated on the open market in Madrid and were often the source of important acquisitions. Some of the Marqués de Solre’s paintings auctioned in 1638, for instance, entered the royal collection, and the Marqués de Leganés acquired large hunting pieces by Frans Snyders from the Madrid sale of the Duc d’Aarschot’s collection. The sales of important collections, which were often major social occasions, allowed middle-class collectors who never left Spain to purchase art from abroad, particularly paintings from Italy and the Netherlands, as well as old masters and high-quality modern works.<sup>305</sup> The Getty Provenance Index has a large body of data from almonedas documenting the dispersal of many collections and which would repay study in itself.

As Fayard has observed, the nobility at court generally lived in rented and unprepossessing houses, and invested more in their decoration and furnishings, coaches, and mules than in property in town.<sup>306</sup> Luxury items and works of art were tokens in the cult of nobility which was such a driving force in the “society of honour” of seventeenth-century Spain. Therefore many noble members of the Council of Castile considered coaches, Flemish tapestries and carpets from the East, pictures, and silver as the appropriate and necessary appurtenances of a noble lifestyle.<sup>307</sup> For other individuals who did not enjoy the distinction of a knighthood, the ownership of paintings appears to have had an important social value. It is remarkable that even comparatively humble members of the palace bureaucracy imitated their social superiors in forming picture collections and even sought to appropriate the same pictures in the form of copies, particularly Venetian old masters as well as those contemporary artists who worked outside Spain who were the preserve of only the most wealthy and socially distinguished collectors, such as Rubens, Ribera, and Frans Snyders.<sup>308</sup> This led to a remarkable degree of conformity in taste among Madrid collectors.

Since external signs of nobility conferred status in the eyes of others and bolstered claims to be “noble,” paintings could be used to give the appearance of living nobly, and to conspicuously reflect the social standing, taste, and wealth of individuals. An extreme case is that of the common-born José González, the hechura of the Conde-Duque de Olivares, who amassed an immense fortune. A record of his own picture collection has not been found, but that of his daughter-in-law María de Vera, widow of Don Juan González de Uzqueta, was drawn up in 1692.<sup>309</sup> This spectacular, noble-scale collection comprised over 750 works, valued by Palomino at nearly 150,000 reales, and included old masters and works by some of the best contemporary painters, such as the royal painter Diego Velázquez.

Included in this publication are inventories drawn up in the 1670s of the picture collections of three successive Secretaries of State, all of whom were knights of the Order of Santiago: Blasco de Loyola (d. 1670, Doc. 85), Diego de la Torre (d. 1674, Docs. 91 and 92), and Bartolomé de Legasa (d. 1679, Doc. 100). Loyola, who had been Secretary of State for the North between 1662–1665, and Legasa shared a taste for Flemish pictures, like many of their contemporaries. A Judgement of Solomon attributed to Rubens headed the valuation of Loyola’s pictures and was the only attributed work as well as one of the most valuable.<sup>310</sup> Loyola’s evident taste for biblical images of the execution of justice (his collection included paintings of Judith and Holofernes, Jael and Sisera, and David) perhaps reflected of the probity of this individual in high office.

Loyola owned a Flemish Tavern Scene, a subject that was very common in Madrid collections by the second half of the century, where it is sometimes listed as a bamboche, a term derived from the Italian bamboccianti that denoted a small northern genre picture. Bartolomé de Legasa’s larger collection of pictures included the traditional northern subject matter of Flemish market scenes, which had been particularly popular among collectors in Spain since the late sixteenth century. His set of ten hunting scenes after Frans Snyders had been copied in Flanders, perhaps even in Snyders’ studio, and were worth an impressive 10,000 reales. Legasa’s copies were probably the next best thing to the large, expensive, and much-sought-after original Snyders paintings of hunts and still lifes that distinguished the royal collection and the exclusive collections of Spanish grandees.

Legasa’s large Venus and Adonis had also been painted in Flanders and was valued at an impressive 3,300 reales. However, Legasa’s valuation was headed, perhaps deliberately, by a very “Spanish” image, a tall Immaculate Conception painted by Angelo Nardi. Nardi’s prestige as a painter and connoisseur seems to have increased over his long life, and although his style of painting remained essentially the timid naturalism of the first third of the century, Legasa's six pictures by Nardi suggests that he particularly liked his work.

The collection of Diego de la Torre (Docs. 91 and 92) was the largest and most distinguished of the three. While in Naples, De la Torre took into his household the painter D. Francisco Pérez Sierra (ca. 1627–1709), who began painting battle pictures in the style of Annielo Falcone and, in Madrid, worked with Juan de Toledo.<sup>311</sup> De la Torre continued to protect the artist in Madrid and commissioned from him paintings for his family chapel. He also arranged for Pérez Sierra to take up the post of Agente general de los presidios de España, which may have afforded the artist a regular income at a time when many members of the profession appear to have suffered financial hardship.<sup>312</sup> At the time of his death, De la Torre's collection inventory listed two battle paintings and a St. Michael by the artist, who was also noted for his landscapes and still lifes.

De la Torre had married into the aristocracy, and his titled wife, the Marquesa de Casaliche, also brought pictures to the marriage.<sup>313</sup> He owned a portrait of Philip IV, the ultimate source of favour in his court career, as well as a set of four pictures of the sack of Antwerp, the "Spanish Fury" that related to his office of Secretary of State for the North (1669–1674). De la Torre's pictures included works by Jan "Velvet" Brueghel and Daniel Seghers and a copy of Van Dyck's Descent from the Cross. A more significant painting of Judith by Rubens was entailed to the estate, and a copy of the same picture was itself valued at 1,000 reales.

Diego de la Torre's choice of copies of paintings by Jusepe de Ribera for his family chapel in the Madrid convent of Los Angeles reflects the esteem in which he held this artist.<sup>314</sup> Ten paintings of religious subjects and single saints by Jusepe de Ribera were listed in De la Torre's collection and may have been acquired while he lived in Naples. All of these pictures were entailed to the estate by mayorazgo, reflecting the great value attached to them.<sup>315</sup> For members of the nobility, the foundation of a mayorazgo guaranteed the direct inheritance of inalienable goods to the eldest male descendant (or eldest female if there were no males), who would, in this way, inherit a "core" collection of valuable works by great masters with which to decorate his or her house. De la Torre and the Marquesa de Casaliche's pictures, therefore, became part of the material means by which their heir would maintain the family's noble lifestyle. A Virgin attributed to Raphael was also entailed to the Casaliche estate. De la Torre owned three other small pictures attributed to Raphael, a copy of the Madonna of the Fish (Fig. 7), and a Christ on the Way to Calvary. The relationship of this latter work to the painting in the royal collection (Fig. 8), and indeed Juan Carreño de Miranda's copy, is unclear. However, it was framed in a gilded and faux tortoise-shell frame, protected with a red taffeta curtain, and valued at the large sum of 6,000 reales. This, however, was only half of the value of an Ecce Homo attributed to Titian in the same collection, which was valued at 11,000 reales.

313. In the estate documents, De la Torre's widow, María de Saraoz declared (12 September 1674) that during their marriage she inherited goods from her mother, Micaela de Trasmiera, including 83 paintings. Among these were the copies of Van Dyck's Deposition and Rubens' Judith mentioned below.

314. Palomino, ed. 1986, p. 375.

315. Some entailed paintings could be analagous to luxury items such as tapestries in terms of value. In the case of the estate of Antonio de Avila, Marqués de las Navas in 1658, for instance, a large painting of Judith which formed part of his mayorazgo was said to be worth over 10,000 ducats and had been pawned to the Almirante de Castilla (AHPM, Prot. 5.971, f. 1179).

Another copy of Raphael's Madonna of the Fish was listed in the collection of Antonio Carnero on 1662, where it was valued at 500 reales (Doc. 72, no. 2). The pictures were copies after Raphael's famous original in the royal collection, which arrived in Spain in 1638 and which Philip IV housed in the Escorial in 1645 (Museo del Prado, Madrid). If Carnero and De la Torre's pictures were in fact the same picture, then its value had increased considerably in a decade, even allowing for inflation. If the two paintings were different copies, then it is a telling marker of a consensus of taste for old masters at the time. Other attributed pictures in Carnero's collection were a good copy after Rubens' Christ and St. John the Baptist, and two pairs of copies after Titian's Ecce Homo and Mater Dolorosa; the Rubens and the better pair of Titian copies hung in Carnero's oratory.

Seven inventories included in this volume list the pictures of contadores, accountants in the administration, and two in particular are remarkable examples of important "middle-class" collections: those of Jerónimo de Alviz (Doc. 27) and Domingo de Soria Arteaga (Doc. 40). Domingo de Soria Arteaga's collection, valued in 1644 on the death of his wife, is unusual for the range and number of attributed pictures – 60 percent of the works are attributed. This high rate of attribution is probably due to the intervention of the collector himself, who oversaw the drawing up of the documents. The roll call of Soria Arteaga's artists includes many of the major contemporary painters active at court: Francisco Collantes, Juan de la Corte, Juan de Espinosa, Juan Fernández "El Labrador," Juan van der Hamen, Jusepe Leonardo, Teodisio Mingot, Pedro Núñez, Pedro Orrente, Antonio Ponce, and Francisco (?) Rómulo, as well as some artists who are unknown today, such as Don Gaspar de Chiriboga. All of these works could have been acquired directly from the artists Soria Arteaga may have patronised, while pictures by older masters such as Alonso Sánchez Coello, Juan Fernández de Navarrete, Juan de Riaño, and El Greco were perhaps bought on the art market. The names of Vicencio Carducho and Eugenio Caxés are conspicuous by their absence from the Soria Arteaga collection; perhaps he did not like their work. He appears to have collected younger artists, at least two of whom, Pedro Núñez and Jusepe Leonardo, were pupils of Carducho and Caxés, respectively.

Unlike his peers, Soria Arteaga was a significant collector of still-life paintings by different contemporary artists active at the court; he appears to have been particularly keen on still lifes by Juan Fernández, "El Labrador". In the hanging of his collection he made one very pertinent comparison of a grape picture by Labrador with an earlier Roman grape painting by Pietro Paolo Bonzi – in this way, perhaps, acknowledging Labrador's sources in early Italian Caravaggesque still-life painting. He also owned landscapes by a number of different hands, which was less unusual, and history paintings with small figures, including 11 works by Juan de la Corte, one of which was a valuable picture of a nocturnal masque.

Soria Arteaga owned works attributed to revered Venetian old masters such as Titian and Bassano, portraits by Alonso Sánchez Coello and Antonio Mor, as well as old master copies. Madrid artists depending on copying for a livelihood may have provided his copies after Titian, Bassano, and Leonardo da Vinci. Rubens, one of the most famous contemporaries in Soria Arteaga's collection, was represented by a St. Catherine. However, this picture, worth 500 reales, was not as highly valued as some of the works by less famous Madrid painters of his day.

One of the most important figure subjects in the collection was Jusepe Leonardo's Moses and the Plague of Serpents, which was a relatively rare theme in Spanish collections; this painting, probably the picture now in the Academia de San Fernando

(Fig. 9), perhaps represented a recent commission from the artist.<sup>316</sup> Soria Arteaga's Moses and Pharaoh's Crown by Pedro Núñez may have been commissioned as a companion piece to this work. Jusepe Leonardo was a protégé of Velázquez who made his name with two battle pictures for the Buen Retiro's Hall of Realms. The high value of his Moses and the Brazen Serpent, if it is the painting in the Real Academia de San Fernando, Madrid, would have been due to its size and large number of figures, especially the skillfully foreshortened cadavers of the foreground based on study of the live model, and the "frescura y suavidad" of the painter's style.<sup>317</sup>

In 1633 Carducho mentioned the collection of the contador Jerónimo de Alviz as among the most outstanding of the capital. While his inventory in 1639 listed only some 50 pictures, made up entirely of religious subjects, still lifes, and landscapes (Doc. 27), all of the attributed works were by contemporary hands, and most were artists active at court. Alviz shared a taste for some of same artists as Soria Arteaga, such as Collantes, Juan de la Corte, Juan van der Hamen, and Orrente. As shown below, all of these were among the most popular names at court and particularly associated with their "specialties" of landscape and still lifes. However, there were no fewer than 10 religious figure subjects by Eugenio Caxés and by his colleague Vicencio Carducho, most of which appear to have been large, expensive easel pictures. Although the means by which Alviz acquired his paintings is unknown, he may be considered a major patron of these important royal painters, and for this reason alone it is not surprising that he earned a mention in Carducho's treatise.

Carducho and Caxés were the the most famous painters at court in the first quarter of the century, royal painters who also worked for religious foundations. Palomino noted that there were more paintings by Carducho in public places than any other eminent artist, and Jusepe Martínez said that the artist was esteemed by his peers and courted by great men.<sup>318</sup> Clearly, artists of such high reputations attracted a large private clientele.<sup>319</sup> In 1641, for instance, the dowry of Isabel Ramírez de Vargas, the daughter of Don Diego Ramírez de Vargas, included nineteen religious pictures by Caxés (Doc. 32). It was common for the value of paintings in dowries to be somewhat inflated over those of estate valuations, and the total value of Ramírez de Vargas's pictures (worth 15,730 reales) appears to have been no exception. This dowry was drawn up on her marriage to a Florentine gentleman, Don Jerónimo Bifi, and perhaps paintings by a Florentine artist were thought appropriate. Some of these were pendant pictures (Doc. 32, nos. 1, 2, 19, 20) and there were two cases of repeated subjects (nos. 1 and 5, 4 and 8). In light of the popularity of Carducho and Caxés among a whole generation of civil servants, Soria Arteaga's apparent lack of interest in their work is unusual. The rather undistinguished collection of pictures inventoried in 1654 in the possession of Luis Fernández de Vega, a contador of the Council of the Indies, was relieved by at least one valuable work of high quality, an Immaculate Conception by Eugenio Caxés (Doc. 60, no. 2). Pictures by Carducho and Caxés also appeared in 1636 in the collection of Cristóbal González Cossío, a knight of the Order of Alcántara, royal secretary and contador (Doc. 22).

319. Surprisingly, the postmortem inventory of Margarita Caxesi Giliocis, daughter of Eugenio Caxés, did not list any works by her father. An anonymous pen drawing of a young man may have been by Caxés. In the valuation of her paintings by José Antolínez, however, a painting of St. Jerome by Carducho was listed. AHPM, Prot. 6.056, unfoliated; Getty Provenance Index No. E-166; Madrid 1657.

Cristobal González Cossío's collection included copies after Venetian artists and the Virgin and Child with St. John after Raphael. In 1636, this latter copy was placed at the head of the valuation of his collection, and at 550 reales was the most valuable painting in the appraisal (Doc. 22). In 1666 the collection was revalued by Juan Carreño de Miranda on the death of Catalina Velasco de Villarín, González Cossío's widow, who appears to have added one important picture by a younger artist, an Immaculate Conception by Jusepe Leonardo (Doc. 81, no. 23). Compared to Andrés López' valuation of the collection in 1636, Carreño de Miranda's valuation of thirty years later shows his greater discernment in this exercise. Thus, a Caxés copy (Doc. 81, no. 6) was worth 330 reales, and an original (Doc. 81, no. 7) was double this amount, which in 1636 had been listed as anonymous and valued at 150 reales. A painting of Hagar by Pedro Orrente, listed as "Jacob's slave" in 1636 and worth 88 reales, was given its correct title, "Abraham's slave" by Carreño de Miranda and its value raised to 550 reales. A triptych by Luis de Morales, worth 80 reales in 1636, was appraised at 500 reales thirty years later. Carreño de Miranda recognised the hand of Francisco Ribalta in a copy of Leonardo's Last Supper. The value of the Raphael copy, however, was lowered to 300 reales (Doc. 81, no. 28), implying that Carreño de Miranda, who himself copied Raphael's Fall on the Way to Calvary, was not so impressed by its quality or condition. The most remarkable change in values relates to pictures by the Roman Caravaggist painter, Antiveduto Gramatica, whose works may have become rare in Spain by the second half of the seventeenth century. In 1636 an example of this artist's work was worth 300 reales (Doc. 22, nos. 51, 52), while Carreño de Miranda in 1666 valued his Flight into Egypt at 2,200 reales and an Incarnation by his school at 1,500 reales (Doc. 81, nos. 4 and 5).

Two collections inventoried in the late seventeenth century, both of which were appraised by Antonio Palomino, typify the taste of the period for hanging together old master paintings, Flemish works, and contemporary Spanish paintings. Andrés de Villarín was a knight of Santiago and a member of the powerful Council of the Royal Treasury (Consejo de Hacienda), whose large collection was valued on his death in 1683 (Doc. 110). This included a painting by Van Dyck of the Incredulity of St. Thomas, and four copies after this artist, one of the Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine which was so well painted as to be worth the same amount as the former original. There were also copies after Titian and Correggio. Villarín's Spanish artists included Orrente and paintings by the landscape specialists Benito Manuel Agüero and Juan de Toledo. Of two pictures by Juan Carreño de Miranda, one was a copy of a St. Onofre by Ribera, which Palomino valued highly at 1,100 reales. Villarín was also an important client of Antonio de Pereda, since his collection included four religious subjects and a Vanitas picture depicting artists' equipment.

The collection of Don Juan de Castañeda, Maestro mayor de la ciencia de las armas de caballeros pajes de Su Majestad, was valued by Palomino in 1694 (Doc. 119). In Castañeda's inventory, the pictures are listed anonymously, while in Palomino's valuation of the collection 60 percent of the works are attributed, and no fewer than 21 different hands are acknowledged in the document. The collection included old master copies: paintings after Titian, Correggio, and Andrea del Sarto, as well as copies after Flemish modern artists: Rubens and Van Dyck. The works of 13 Spanish artists active in Madrid are listed. These included a Zurbarán painting of a bound lamb, an Agnus Dei type perhaps from the artist's late period in Madrid. A painting of St. Jerome by Mateo Cerezo was the most valuable picture in Palomino's appraisal. Castañeda's taste for the painterly baroque style of his own day is also reflected in works by Francisco de Herrera (probably the Younger), Escalante, Matias de Torres, and Antolínez. This, however, did not prevent Castañeda from owning a picture of Christ Carrying the Cross by Antonio Arias, an artist who painted in a tight, neo-Florentine disegno. Palomino himself was represented in the collection with a Guardian Angel, paired with an image of St. Michael by Antolínez. Like Andrés de Villarán, Castañeda also owned a Vanitas Still Life by Antonio de Pereda.

The status of the many-faceted artist Alonso Cano appears always to have been high among artists and connoisseurs. Painter to the Conde-Duque de Olivares, Cano was in Madrid from 1638 and occupied a privileged position at court as a friend of Velázquez and a member of group of Sevillian artists ascendant in the early part of Philip's reign. Lázaro Díaz del Valle's long biography of Cano, written between 1656 and 1659, some years after the artist had left Madrid, reflects the esteem he enjoyed.<sup>320</sup> The author claimed that in his painting Cano "se aventaja a todos los grandes artifices de este tiempo," saying that his hand was recognisable to even uncultivated viewers, and using adjectives such as "divino," "sublime," and "milagrosa" to describe a style that also reflected the artist-priest's piety.

The work of Alonso Cano appears in the inventories of three silk and cloth merchants included in this volume. The collection of the mercader de paños Antonio Cruzat y Villanueva, inventoried in 1659, included a small Entombment of Christ by Cano, which he had protected with a curtain (Doc. 70, no. 8). If the figure of the saint in his painting of St. Catherine by Cano was dressed in rich draperies, this subject might have held particular appeal to an individual who dealt in cloth, as could also have been the case with the copy of Correggio's Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine in the collection of the silk merchant Francisco Díaz de la Hoz (Doc. 64). The first painting listed in the inventory of Díaz de la Hoz drawn up in 1656 and the most valuable work in his collection was a Christ of the Passion with an Angel by Cano, worth 650 reales. Another unfinished version of this subject was in the collection of José de Lezcana, tasador de joyas in 1681. Two versions of this subject, representing the dead Christ supported by an angel, are today in the Prado Museum. Works by Cano are also listed in the collections of Martín Fernández Hidalgo, mercader, in 1656.<sup>321</sup> and Juana Alvarez de Pedrosa, wife of Francisco Ruíz de Miranda, mercader de sedas, in 1671 (Doc. 86). Francisco Horcasitas (d.1672), Contador mayor de fianças de rentas reales, a Vizcayan merchant who traded in iron and wool and later became a member of the administration, owned two Canos, Christ and the Samaritan Woman and Christ's Descent into Limbo, which are the same subjects as paintings in the Academia de San Fernando, Madrid, and the Los Angeles County Museum (Fig. 10).<sup>322</sup> Eight flower paintings in the collection of Antonio Proano, panadero de corte, in 1663, show that even an artist as famous as Cano occasionally turned his hand to the "minor" genres.<sup>323</sup>

However, his executors had a number of unsold works reappraised for sale at lower values by the painter Jerónimo Gallardo, which included the two paintings by Cano: "Lo primero una pintura de la samaritana de Alonso Cano de dos barras de alto y una de largo poco mas o menos tasada su echura en nobecientos Reales; otra pintura de christo nro señor del dño cano y del mismo tamaño quando su Divina Mag.d bajo al Limbo tasada en otros nobecientos Reales...."

This last was followed by another anonymous painting of Christ's Descent into Limbo, valued at 1,300 reales. Horcasitas' collection also included copies after paintings by Titian (Entombment) and Ribera (St. Peter).

323. AHPM, Prot. 6.700, unfoliated, with paintings appraised on 10 March 1663 by Pedro de Noriega, painter: "mas ocho floreros de cano con sus marcos negros," which were valued at 330 reales each and which represented the most valuable group of paintings in the collection.

The royal painter Francisco Rizi's valuation of the paintings of Don Pedro de Vallejo in 1678 opened with a large painting (over 168 x 126 cm.) of Christ at the Column by Cano. This had also headed Vallejo's inventory, where it had pride of place in the main reception room of his home ("en la Pieça principal del recibim<sup>10</sup>") (Doc. 98). Indeed, this picture was valued at 5,500 reales, which, along with a large Immaculate Conception by Juan Carreño de Miranda, made them the most valuable works in the entire collection, and worth more than religious subjects by such artists as Juan Antonio de Escalante (Rest on the Flight into Egypt) and Mateo Cerezo (Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine). Some of these paintings may have been acquired a few months earlier from the distinguished collection of works by Madrid artists owned by the wealthy silversmith Luis de Zabalza in 1678 (Doc. 97).

The inventories of the picture collections of a number of silversmiths and jewelers in Madrid reflect the importance of such wealthy artisans for the collecting of contemporary painters. In the distinguished collection of the platero de cámara, Luis de Zabalza (d. 1677) there was a half-length portrait of Philip IV by Velázquez in an ebony frame, paintings of religious subjects by Pedro Núñez and Alonso Cano, and the works of younger contemporaries; three paintings by Juan Carreño de Miranda and Mateo Cerezo, two by Juan Bautista de Escalante, and a picture by Francisco Camilo.<sup>324</sup> Zabalza owned some pictures of the same subject by different hands, such as versions of the Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine by Núñez and Mateo Cerezo, Immaculate Conceptions by Juan Carreño de Miranda and Mateo Cerezo (as well as four other representations of this subject listed). A Carreño de Miranda copy of Titian's Lucretia could be viewed alongside originals by Carreño de Miranda. Perhaps this reflected a deliberate policy, focusing discussion of the relative merits of each artist among visitors to the collection. Certainly, Zabalza's taste was for contemporary artists noted for their ability as colourists; thus Díaz del Valle admired Escalante for his good drawing and genius in colour, Camilo for his admirable colour, "soft, fresh, and sweet," and Carreño de Miranda for his superior handling of colour. The work of Francisco Rizi is conspicuous by its absence; this artist does not appear to have enjoyed the same degree of popularity on the private art market as his colleague Carreño de Miranda. Zabalza's most valuable painting in Smidt's valuation was, however, Alonso Cano's Christ at the Column. This important picture was bought from Zabalza's estate by Don Sebastián de Soria, who may have sold it almost immediately to Don Pedro de Vallejo.<sup>325</sup> Díaz del Valle remarked on Cano's having studied anatomy, an unusual and distinguishing faculty among Spanish artists, which would have undoubtedly been a factor contributing to the high status of this painting among collectors.<sup>326</sup>

The inventory of Cristóbal de Alfaro, goldsmith (platero de oro), in 1681 included works by Pedro Núñez and J.F. de Escalante. The collection of Joseph de Lezcana, tasador de joyas, inventoried in 1681 was unusual in containing unfinished paintings. One was an unfinished painting by Alonso Cano of a Dead Christ Sup- ported by an Angel, and six others were religious subjects by Mateo Cerezo, four of which were described as unfinished. One of these, the Nativity of Christ, was displayed in a pine frame, while the others were unframed. Mateo Cerezo's works were comparatively rare, as he died prematurely in 1666. The unfinished Cerezos were not completed by another artist, as was customary, and Lezcana could have acquired them from the deceased artist's estate sale, displaying them in their unfinished state for over fifteen years. Indeed, given the aesthetic of "sketchy" painting in the art of the later seventeenth century in Spain, Lezcana may even have admired these works precisely for their "unfinished" qualities.

324. Zabalza's executors, his widow María de Aguilar and Licenciado Don Tomás Roset, were responsible for the attributions of the pictures in the inventory, which are not noted in the appraisal by the painter Andrés Smidt.

325. Zabalza's sale began on 7 February 1678, and one Francisco Sierra bought many of his paintings. Don Sebastián de Soria bought Cano's Christ at the Column for 3,300 reales on 9 February. He also acquired for 2,700 reales an Immaculate Conception which measured 2½ x 1½ varas and, which was probably the work by Carreño de Miranda, and which may have been the same picture as the one recorded in Vallejo's collection.

326. Two paintings by Alonso Cano of Christ at the Column are relevant here. One, painted ca. 1660, has been at Ávila since the eighteenth century and is now in the Carmelitas Descalzas de San José. Wethey, ed. 1983, p. 116, no. 8. An earlier painting, painted ca. 1646–50, is now at Bucharest, National Museum, and has an unknown provenance. Wethey, ed. 1983, p. 116, no. 9.

The royal silversmith Andrés de Villaroel, platero de cámara del Rey and tasador de las reales joyas, included a holograph valuation of his own capital appended to a codicil of 1656 (Doc. 62). At this time his picture collection was not large, numbering only some 43 pictures. However, he clearly liked the work of Pedro Núñez, 14 of whose pictures he owned. Two of these were religious subjects, including an Immaculate Conception. A pair of originals seem to have been classicizing allegories on the theme of love, with cupids restraining a lion and chastising a satyr, symbolising the restraint of the passions, perhaps, and reflecting a degree of learning and sophistication in their owner.<sup>327</sup> Villaroel also owned a number of mythological subjects painted as landscapes with small figures, which were said to be originals of Pedro Núñez. He owned a view of Madrid by Núñez and a townscape of Rome, where the artist had lived. Villaroel appears to have enjoyed landscape painting, since his collection included a Pedro Orrente, a scene of classical ruins by Paul Bril, and other Flemish landscapes. Villaroel's other attributed pictures were fruit still lifes by Juan van der Hamen, some of which depicted silverware, a copy of a St. Francis by El Greco, and a copy after Titian of a painting of the Virgin.

The biographies of Díaz del Valle and Palomino make clear that many Madrid artists depended on sales to private collectors for their livelihoods. These were artists whose works were to be found in "casas particulares" rather than in public places.<sup>328</sup> The range of attributions contained in inventories included in this volume prove the importance of the private market for artists active at court. The artists named in the above documents include some of the most distinguished and famous of the "Golden Age". Some documents, furthermore, list pictures attributed to artists who were clearly well known to contemporaries in their day, but whose fame has sometimes dimmed to complete obscurity today. Works by one Don Gaspar de Chiriboga were recognised in the Soria Arteaga collection in 1644. And who was the Francisco de Pedraza whose works are mentioned in the collection of Don Juan de Castañeda (Doc. 119, nos. 5, 27, 44) and even so distinguished a collection as that of the Marqués del Carpio?<sup>329</sup> In 1669 Don Juan de Torres y Barrantes, a familiar of the Inquisition, drew up a detailed inventory of goods on the death of his wife, Catalina de Alvarado (Doc. 84). It cited works by different hands, and even discriminated between the contributions of artists in collaborative pictures, in the case, for instance, of a garland painted by Juan de Arellano containing a Virgin and Sleeping Child by Mateo Cerezo. While Torres y Barrantes boasted works by the best-known Spanish artists, for instance El Greco, Zurbarán, and Eugenio Caxés, he also owned pictures by Juan de Toledo, Santiago (?) Morán, and the Valencian artist Pedro García Ferrer (1583–1660), as well as by Diego González de Vega (ca. 1628–1697), a pupil of Francisco Rizi.

327. Two paintings with cupids in landscapes, in one scene bullfighting, have been attributed to Juan Sánchez Cotán (E. Orozco Díaz, El pintor Fray Juan Sánchez Cotán, Granada 1993, pp. 308–309, nos. 8–9) and José Antolínez (Angulo 1957, p. 43, no. 48). For an anonymous Madrid school painting of Cupids playing, see López Torrijos 1985, fig. 169.

328. Díaz del Valle (ed. 1933, pp. 373, 386) mentions Francisco Caro and Manuel de Molina in this way. Palomino cites the works of the following painters in many casas particulares: Pedro de las Cuevas, Antonio de Contreras, Francisco Varela, Pedro de Obregón, Bartolomé Román, Angelo Nardi, Don Francisco de Caro, Sebastián Martínez, José de Ledesma, Andrés de Vargas, Francisco de Palacios, Francisco Solís, and Antonio de Castrejón.

329. Paintings of the Virgin and St. Jerome by Pedraza were also inventoried among the paintings of Juana Morano, wife of Cristóbal de Alfaro in 1684 (AHPM, Prot. 8.134, unfoliated; Getty Provenance Index No. E-243).

In 1665 Tomás Sánchez drew up an inventory of his estate on the death of his wife Ana María de Peñaranda (Doc. 76). The paintings were valued by Francisco Gutiérrez Cavello, a popular painter of “perspectives” praised by Díaz del Valle, and included two of his own works, the Marriage of the Virgin and the Meeting of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, which were the most highly valued works in the collection. The collection included six religious subjects by Escalante, one of which was a Virgin with a Sleeping Christ Child, a version of which Palomino mentioned in the house of an unnamed aficionado. However, the collection also included a large number of works by two painters whose works are unknown today. The obscure artist Juan Bautista de la Cotera appears to have been a respected member of the artistic community at court; he was represented by six religious paintings and seven “perspectives” and battles.<sup>330</sup> Manuel de Molina was represented by no fewer than 17 religious subjects. Díaz del Valle knew this artist, who was from Burgos and seventy years old in 1658, and noted that he was a prolific painter whose works were to be found in private houses in Madrid.<sup>331</sup> Molina would appear to have typified the host of minor artists active at court who must have relied totally on the patronage of private collectors and the open market for their livelihood. While the inventory reproduced here testifies to the degree of popularity his works enjoyed among collectors in his lifetime, by the time Palomino came to write his biographies of Spanish artists, Molina’s reputation had sunk into obscurity.<sup>332</sup>

Painter-Appraisers

In 1652 Velázquez was made Aposentador and took an active role in the display of pictures in the royal collection in the Hall of Mirrors of the Madrid Alcázar, and was responsible for the framing and the hanging of major religious paintings by Italian old masters in the sacristy of the Escorial. By the 1630s Velázquez was already reputed to be “a man of great judgement,” who became the foremost artist-connoisseur in Spain and who was sent to Italy in 1649 to buy art and antiquities for the king.<sup>333</sup> Velázquez and Angelo Nardi, an aged Italian royal painter who was a favourite of the king, assessed old master pictures bought from the English royal collection as they arrived in Madrid, taking care to allow only originals to reach royal eyes.<sup>334</sup> Thus Raphael’s

The paintings were bought by the Spanish ambassador in London, Alonso de Cárdenas. The precedent of Philip II was important in this respect, since he had only hung original paintings at the Escorial. Diego de Niseno (El Fénix de la Grecia, Madrid 1643, p. 83) claimed “El Salomón católico. Felipe II, no quiso admitir en aquella su óctava maravilla del mundo un cuadro como para el gusto de tal rey, tal

Holy Family (Fig. 11), reputed to be one of the greatest pictures in the world, was imported into Spain, and became the “pearl” of Philip’s collection and the famed centerpiece of Velázquez’s 1656 hang of some of Philip’s finest religious paintings in the Escorial sacristy. Tintoretto’s Washing of the Feet (Fig. 12) was “a great original” according to Velázquez and Nardi. In a curious lapse of attention on the part of these artists, Correggio’s Education of Cupid (Fig. 5) was not deemed good enough and was taken by the prime minister Don Luis de Haro, who magnanimously declared that he would hang it in his own gallery and pretend it was an original!<sup>335</sup>

Royal painters were themselves numbered among the most respected connoisseurs of their day. Díaz del Valle owned a certificate of authenticity written by Rubens in 1635, concerning an original painting by Lucas Craen in the collection of Thomas Camayori, and which, Rubens wrote, was so well preserved “as if it had just left the hands of the artist” and of such value that it could be presented to the king.<sup>336</sup> The opinion of Angelo Nardi was sought by the Florentine ambassador over the affair of Cigoli’s Ecce Homo, discussed above, who also said the painter had advised “many gentlemen” with regard to their paintings. In 1627, the competition for a painting of the Expulsion of the Moors, won by Velázquez, was judged by two other Italians: the Roman aristocrat and amateur Juan Bautista Crescenzi, Marqués de la Torre, and the Dominican painter and drawing master to the king, Juan Bautista Mayno, who “both had a great understanding of painting” according to Pacheco.<sup>337</sup> Later, Mayno informally expressed his opinion on the work of another court painter, and said that Alonso Cano’s Miracle of St. Isidore at the Well (1646–48) (Museo del Prado, Madrid, Fig. 13) was one of the best pictures he had ever seen.<sup>338</sup> Velázquez is said to have expressed great admiration for Diego Polo’s Fall of Manna (Fig. 6), perhaps lending his seal of approval to this young artist’s neo-Venetian painting style.<sup>339</sup> The visiting Italian frescoist Angelo Michele Colonna told Philip IV that Juan Carreño de Miranda was the best painter at court on the strength of his frescoes in the Colegio de Atocha.<sup>340</sup>

While there are only very scant notices of the informed opinions of painters on the works of their colleagues, artists were employed in the traditional role of expert (perito) in the valuation of works of art. In Seville and Toledo, the commissioning bodies of altarpieces set the artists’ final fee after completion of the work, according to an appraisal (tasación) by third parties, consisting of one or more professional artists. El Greco’s litigations with his corporate patrons over remuneration for his art exposed the ideological and practical shortcomings inherent in this system, which was weighted in favour of patrons.<sup>341</sup> At court, it was normal for painters in the royal employ to value one another's work when necessary; thus Pedro Núñez set the price for Caxés' Agamemnon and Chryses for the Alcázar's New Room.<sup>342</sup> Carducho's Scipio Africanus Addressing the Romans, commissioned for the same room, was appraised posthumously by Felix Castelo (representing Carducho's heirs) and Velázquez (on behalf of the king).<sup>343</sup> In most cases the criteria on which such appraisals were based are unknown. However, Juan Bautista Mayno's notarised appraisal of the fresco painting of Vicencio Carducho and Eugenio Caxés in the sacristy of Toledo Cathedral in 1615 is unusual in its detail and gives a good idea of the features of the painting that his valuation took into account.<sup>344</sup>

335. Harris 1982, p. 436, quoting Haro’s fragmentary despatch to Cárdenas of 17 December 1654. Haro speaks of his “disgusto” on finding that some of the paintings were not originals and thus not suitable for the king’s quarters, although he was convinced that the painters in England knew better than their Spanish counterparts in the matter of the authenticity of Correggio’s Education of Cupid. In order to ameliorate this, “se colgarán el el mio con la buena fe en que se deben tener segun el conocim.<sup>o</sup> que tienen de ellas los pintores de allá... y los tendré por originales.”

It is difficult to assess the degree of artists' involvement with the collecting activities of private collectors. Bartolomé Carducho appears to have acted almost in a curatorial capacity with regard to the collection of the Duque de Lerma, importing Italian pictures for his patron, repairing paintings, and drawing up an inventory-appraisal of the entire collection in 1603.<sup>345</sup> It was usual for artists attached to a collector's household to undertake a wide range of painting tasks, including decorative work; the Almirante de Castilla employed Juan de Alfaro, for instance, as portraitist and restorer.<sup>346</sup> Just as Velázquez and Angelo Nardi were called on to assess the quality and originality of paintings destined for the royal collection, private collectors sometimes solicited the informed opinions of prominent painters. The Conde-Duque de Olivares, heir of Philip IV's famous privado, commissioned Francisco de Herrera the younger to choose the best paintings from an estate auction.<sup>347</sup> José Antolínez made a painting of Doubting Thomas in vindication of his opinion against that of other painters regarding the originality of an unspecified Spanish painting in the Almirante de Castilla's collection.<sup>348</sup>

Apart from painting itself, the single most important activity of artists at court as documented in notarial archives is their appraisal of paintings for estate sales (almonedas) and estate partitions (particiones).<sup>349</sup> In such documents, the paintings were separated from the estate for valuation by an expert who was himself involved in the profession, just as the silverware was valued by silversmiths, furniture by cabinet-makers, books by booksellers, and clothing by tailors.<sup>350</sup> Poorer-quality paintings were sometimes appraised by picture dealers (tratantes en pinturas). And occasionally amateurs (e.g., a notary, a priest, and a royal functionary) undertook such valuations.<sup>351</sup> In most cases, paintings were inventoried in the same way as other items of furniture and generally given no more attention than these. Indeed, paintings in these documents are often described in less detail than other moveable goods, such as precious objects, clothing, and books. While the literal physical descriptions of paintings usually comprised size, support, frame, medium, and subject matter, their authorship was a rare discretionary refinement to the normal formula.

Difficulties could begin with the choice of appraiser; one of these was Licenciado Juan de Roelas, but Vicencio Carducho protested at the low valuations given to his frescoes by another northern artist, Pedro Horelín de Poulitiers, saying, with just cause, "es ordinario pintor y de ningún nombre y experiencia". 350. In Madrid, painters usually included in their valuations picture frames, prints and works on paper, screens, works of art and furnishings from oratories, and exotica. Since painters in Spain gilded and polychromed wood sculptures, these were also normally included in their valuations and the names of their authors sometimes given. In Seville, a more strict division of areas of expertise existed, and sculptors usually valued picture frames and works of sculpture. This was less common in appraisals at court. For example, see the collection of Pedro van Wucht (Doc. 34), in which a cabinetmaker, Abraham Lers, valued the picture frames; also the valuation of the collection of the Condesa de Oñate in 1685 (Doc. 112), in which the frames were again valued separately.

Postmortem estate inventories had to take place within thirty days of the death of the individual in question. Paintings, like other furnishings from the estate were itemised and identified goods for legal reasons; these documents did not function as artistic records. In the same way, notarised estate appraisals (tasaciones) served a purely utilitarian purpose. Goods from the estate of a deceased individual were valued for their division (partición) among relatives and prior to their sale (almoneda) in order to fund the bequests and masses itemised in the last will and testament. Painter-appraisers were nominated by the executors of the estate and swore on the sign of the cross that they were disinterested parties who would value items fairly, according to their knowledge and understanding (“saber y entender”). Like other appraisers, painters were required to establish the “fair price” (justo precio) of items to be sold in a public estate sale.<sup>352</sup> This meant setting the mean value (el mediano) of the painting, which could be sold for no less than half this value (el más bajo) and no more than one-and-a-half times the same (el más alto). Thus, a painting valued at 100 reales could be sold within the range of 50–150 reales; if it were sold for less than 50 reales, the vendor could legally demand restitution, and if it were sold for more than 150 reales, the same legal recourse was available to the buyer. In a number of cases, the values assigned to the paintings were considered too high for auction and sometimes pictures simply did not sell, which necessitated lowering their reserve values by a notarised document of reappraisal – normally, but not always, undertaken by a different artist.<sup>353</sup> No document of this kind is known that raised the values of paintings intended for public auction. During times of acute currency fluctuation in the later seventeenth century, the appraised values of paintings could be reduced by one-third, and even one-half, to ensure their sale at auction.<sup>354</sup>

351. In 1640, the small number of paintings of Bernarda de Paz del Río were valued by the royal notary Juan Bautista de Ulpit, described in the document as “escrivano de su mag.<sup>d</sup> y de su infantería en españa persona practica e yntelijente en el conoçimiento de la pintura” (AHPM, Prot. 5.758, ff. 65–86). In 1646, the paintings of D. Pedro Ordoñez, a knight of the Order of Santiago and member of the royal Consejo de Ordenes, were valued by Matheo de Pino, “Clerigo presbitero ombre piritu en el arte de pinturas” (AHPM, Prot. 6.010, ff. 927v–928), and in 1629 the pictures of D. Juan Matienzo de Peralta were appraised by Simón de Alcántara, “criado de su mag.<sup>d</sup> ... ques persona que sabe y entiende del dho arte” (AHPM, Prot. 2.682, ff. 1058–1065). In 1651, the paintings of Joseph de Trujillo, royal accountant, were appraised by Roque Antonio de Palacios, “perssona que entiende de pinturas” (AHPM, Prot. 7.140, ff. 812–812v). None of the above individuals was described as a professional painter.

352. This account of the justo precio in estate sales is from Francisco García, Tratado utilísimo y muy general de todos los contractos, quantos en los negocios humanos se suelen ofrecer, Valencia 1583, pp. 572–585, “De la venta que se haze en almoneda,” esp. pp. 574–578. See also Tomás de Mercado, Suma de Tratos y Contratos, 1569; ed. Seville 1587, pp. 63v–68v.

353. For example, on 5 January 1685, Juan de Vega valued the paintings of Josefa Lozano de Arroyo, deceased widow of Benito de Tapia. The first painting listed was a large Nativity, attributed to Angelo Nardi in the inventory, but which Vega thought was painted by Ribera and consequently valued at 200 ducats (2,200 reales). The second picture valued was an Immaculate Conception, also thought to be by Ribera and consequently worth 1,100 reales. In a reevaluation of the paintings by another artist, Francisco Lopano, on 18 May 1685, the values of almost all of the paintings in the collection were lowered, the first painting drastically reduced to a more realistic 800 reales and the second to 600 reales. In this case, both Vega’s connoisseurship and his knowledge of the market appear to have been faulty. AHPM, Prot. 8.109, unfoliated.

354. See, for example, the collection of Luis de Zabalza (Doc. 97), which was valued in 1678 by Andrés Smidt, with the condition that the values could be reduced by a third, and even a half, if they were to fail to sell at

Painters' appraisals normally followed the order and even the wording of the inventory written by the same notary's hand. They are usually as inscrutable as these documents regarding attributions, even when they were written in the artist's own hand.<sup>355</sup> Some documents listed the paintings collection in order of subject matter, although this seems to have been a practice more common in the first half of the seventeenth century than in the latter part of the century. Thus, religious paintings, images from oratories, profane works, and portraits could be listed separately.<sup>356</sup> Generally speaking, the artist-appraiser, accompanied by a notary, toured the collection while the paintings were still on the wall, and, as noted above, some documents mentioned the different rooms in which these were found (e.g., Comte de Solre, Doc. 24). While still in situ, many paintings may have been difficult to see. It was probably more common that paintings were taken down from the wall and the artist-appraiser was shown individual works in succession.<sup>357</sup> Although some artists appear to have made a specialty of this activity, they appear to have been paid relatively little, their fees reflecting the number of paintings valued and the length of time taken in appraising them.<sup>358</sup> Palo-

In Antonio de Pereda's reappraisal of the values of the paintings of the Conde de Molina originally set by Francisco de Herrera and Andrés Smidt, in most cases he reduced them by a third to ensure their sale (Doc. 93). In 1683, the collection of Don Francisco de Altamira Angulo was appraised by Francisco Rizi, and the paintings' sale prices were reduced by a third because of currency shortages. (AHPM, Prot. 9.868, ff. 312–322, 2 August 1683, with the sale beginning on 27 September 1683, ff. 330–382). See also the discussion of the dowry of Pedro de Arce's second wife (Doc. 82).

355. In June 1632, for instance, the painter Francisco Barrera, who undertook many estate appraisals throughout his long career, wrote in his own hand his valuation of the paintings and single sculpture of Doctor Pedro de Barcena Carrasa. This document, which follows the conventional format for appraisals, was notarised and bound into the protocol with the other papers pertaining to Carrasa's estate. AHPM, Prot. 4.469, ff. 903–903v.

356. The Duke of Lerma's inventory of 1603 was divided between religious subjects and "Retratos y pinturas a lo humano," comprising portraits, mythologies, and secular works. (Schroth 1990, p. 27). Examples reproduced here include the collections of Gil Ramírez de Arellano (Doc. 3), the Marqués de Montesclaros (Doc. 13), and Gaspar de Borja (Doc. 42). In 1641, the paintings collection of Don Pedro Marmolejo Ponce de León was inventoried in two sections: religious images and "pinturas profanas," mostly portraits. In 1644, the inventory of the collection of the Conde de Oñate was divided up between "retratos," "pinturas de historias," mostly mythologies, and "láminas," all of which were religious subjects.

357. Two artists, Francisco de Zurbarán and Francisco Rizi, valued the paintings of the notary Francisco Frelchel in 1664, and "hicieron la tasación de las Pinturas q les fue mostradas". The fact that the names of the rooms are entered in the margin of the document suggests that these painters were taken through the house and shown works that were still hanging on walls. AHPM, Prot. 8.231, ff. 171–174v, 28 February 1664 (Cascales y Muñoz 1911). In the case of the collection of Don Francisco de Prado Bravo de Mendoza (valuation, Doc. 48), the paintings were inventoried hanging on the wall, while others were listed as brought down and leaning against the wall. In a typical example, the painter Alonso del Arco valued the paintings of the regidor Don Juan Díaz de la Mora by being shown the paintings ("pinturas que le fueren mostradas tocantes a su oficio") and examining them in great detail ("aviendolas visto mui por menor Con todo cuidado las taso en las candidades siguientes"). AHPM, Prot. 11.434, ff. 56–58v, 4 June 1672.

358. The following sample gives some idea of the fees to painters for appraisals, which were in line with the remuneration of other experts in estate valuations. In 1609, Alonso del Moral received 6 reales for valuing the paintings collection and oratory furnishings of Don Francisco de Velasco, Gentilhombre de boca de Su Majestad (AHPM, Prot. 2.284, ff. 699–701). In 1635 Francisco de Burgos Mantilla received 6 reales for valuing the small collection of paintings of the contador Domingo Garan de Allande (AHPM, Prot. 6.612, ff. 167v–168, 237v), but only one real for appraising the paintings of Luisa Tenorio in 1650 (AHPM, Prot. 4.499, ff. 168–169). In 1636 Jerónimo Márquez received 8 reales for appraising a small number of undistinguished religious paintings of a baker, Francisco Pérez (AHPM, Prot. 5.963, ff. 131–133, 224). In 1638, Domingo Guerra Coronel received 12 reales for his valuation of the paintings of Don Teofilo Faustino (AHPM, Prot. 6.196, ff. 941–942), and in 1650 he again received 12 reales for valuing a collection (Agulló y Cobo 1981, p. 100). One Isidro de Castillo y Aguilar received 36 reales for valuing the collection of Doctor Juan de Villaroel on the death of his wife in 1656 (AHPM, Prot. 7.845, ff. 1169–1170v) and in 1660, Bartolomé Sanz received 50 reales for his

Painters' appraisals do not give the criteria by which individual paintings were judged, nor the opinions of the artists concerned. The appraised values of pictures listed in inventories, as well as fluctuations in these throughout the period, may be linked to the authorship of paintings and taste for these.<sup>360</sup> In a number of cases, painter-appraisers valued their own works most highly of all, as in the case of Francisco Gutiérrez's appraisal of the collection of Ana María de Peñaranda in 1665 (Doc. 76).<sup>361</sup> In some documents, an inflated attribution is belied by the low valuation assigned to the work in the appraisal. Documents occasionally refer to the aesthetic quality and physical condition of pictures in the most general manner, "de buena mano," "pintura ordinaria" or "maltratado," for instance.<sup>362</sup> In the case of a set of twelve flowerpieces in the collection of Diego de Angulo in 1640, the appraisers, Alonso Cano and Andrés López Polanco, frankly thought they were "mala pintura," valuing the works at only five reales each (Doc. 29). Exceptions to such formulaic responses, however, sometimes occur when the collector himself was involved in drawing up the document. When the canon of Granada cathedral, Doctor Juan de Matute, drew up the inventory of his paintings collection in 1628 (Doc. 14), his pride in their quality and his own good taste is communicated across the centuries. He enthuses about his pictures ("muy alta pintura," "extraordinaria pintura," "valiente mano," "gran pintor") and boasts about the amounts he paid for these and the fact that other collectors had offered to buy them from him. In some cases where the collector oversaw the inventory of his own collection, the number of attributed works listed is high; examples include the collection of Domingo de Soria Arteaga (Doc. 40), Andrés de Villaroel (Doc. 62), and Nicolás de Omazur in Seville.<sup>363</sup> Don Miguel de Salamanca supervised his wife's postmortem inventory in 1655 (Doc. 63) that included paintings attributed to Flemish hands; these were dropped from his postmortem inventory of 1658, and their authorship probably went unrecognised by his heirs and executors.<sup>364</sup> The case of Don Vincenio Juan de Lastanosa, who wrote two descriptions of the furnishings and collections in his own house at Huesca in 1634 and 1662, appears to be unique for the period in Spain.<sup>365</sup>

Occasionally, inventories specify that paintings were signed, and sometimes pictures were labelled with the names of famous artists.<sup>366</sup> In some cases, the attributions

The highest fee known to this author is Francisco Barrera's fee of 142 reales received for his appraisal of the large collection of the Condesa-Duquesa de Olivares in 1648. to paintings in inventories and valuations were changed; thus, for instance, the painter Mateo Gallardo attributed a painting to Vicencio Carducho in the collection of Fernando de Tinoco in 1652 and subsequently changed this to Angelo Nardi (Doc. 54, no. 4). While the authorship of paintings would be reasonably expected to affect their evaluation, attributions were not a requirement of inventories or appraisals and are assigned extremely inconsistently to paintings in these documents. In the case of the modest collection of Juan Moreno, wife of the goldsmith Cristobal de Alfaro, the appraisal was headed by a painting of the Adoration of the Kings by Pedro Núñez and a St. Joseph from the school of Andrea Vaccaro, which were also the two most highly valued paintings in the document. Other highly valued paintings in the same document were not attributed, however, while works by Escalante and one Francisco de Pedraza were recognised by the painter-appraiser, one Diego de Salazar.<sup>367</sup> In the case of the collection of Luis de Zabalza in 1678 (Doc. 97), his postmortem inventory listed many attributed paintings, while the appraisal by the painter Andrés Smidt did not contain any. Francisco de Herrera's valuation of the paintings in the collection of Juan Bautista Zavala in 1682 (Doc. 108) not only omitted mentioning their authors but, in some cases, did not even specify their subject matter.<sup>368</sup> Collections appraised by two painters did not necessarily result in an increased number of attributed works, and, in the case of the collection of Don Francisco Prado Bravo de Mendoza, for instance, some of the entries in the valuation are extremely cursory (Doc. 48).<sup>369</sup> Indeed, a tendency to specify authorship appears to have borne no relation to the quality of the collection, the importance of the owner, or the expertise of the artist, as is shown by inventories and appraisals of great collections such as those of the Duc d'Aarschot (Docs. 30 and 31), the Duques del Infantado (Docs. 1, 9, and 10) and the Almirantes de Castilla (Docs. 18, 43, 74, and 117).

Generally speaking, however, in our sample of documents the incidence of attributed paintings increases in inventories and valuations from the second half of the seventeenth century, and appears to reach a peak in the third quarter of the century.<sup>370</sup> Given the interest in paintings that distinguished Philip IV and his reign, this broad tendency may reflect a greater diffusion of connoisseurship by this time. And although estate appraisals did always require connoisseurship, often artist-valuers did note attributions. Vicencio Carducho attributed paintings to Italian artists in his valuation of the collection of Doctor Alonso Cortés in 1632, although the paintings were anonymous in the inventory, and assigned high values to the pictures perhaps to reflect the high status of the art of painting in his eyes (Doc. 17). While no attributed paintings were listed in the inventories of Eugenio Caxés's daughter Margarita in 1657 and D. Antonio Carnero in 1662 (Doc. 72), the respective appraisals by José Antolínez and Francisco de Burgos Mantilla identified a number of their hands.<sup>371</sup> In the case of the small collection of Diego Pérez Dávila, Abbot of Santa María de Astorga in 1638, the fact that Angelo Nardi did not repeat the attribution of paintings to El Greco established in the inventory might imply his disagreement with these claims (Doc. 25). Antonio de Pereda made a number of significant attributions in his valuation of the important collection of the Conde de Monterrey in 1653, although he did not repeat this exercise in his valuation of the pictures on the death of the Duquesa de Monterrey in 1655 (Doc. 61).

370. In the Spanish inventories included in the Getty Provenance Index database, 8 percent of pictures inventoried between 1600–1625 are attributed, 15 percent between 1626–1650, 19 percent between 1651–1675, and 35 percent between 1676–1700. Three Carpio inventories (Docs. 109, 114, and 115) fall into the last time period and make up 80 percent of the number of attributed pictures.

371. Margarita Caxés Giliocis, AHPM, Prot. 6.056, unfoliated; Getty Provenance Index No. E-166.

Juan Carreño de Miranda and Antonio Palomino are distinguished among all other painter-appraisers in Madrid for most consistently exercising their considerable connoisseurship in the attribution of pictures for estate valuations, assigning works to native and foreign artists alike, sometimes specifying the different hands in collaborative works, and distinguishing originals from copies.<sup>372</sup> Significant examples include Carreño de Miranda's appraisal of the collection of Catalina Velasco de Villarín in 1666 (Doc. 81) and Palomino's valuation of the paintings of Andrés Villarín in 1683 (Doc. 110). While the paintings owned by Don Juan de Castañeda were listed anonymously in his postmortem inventory, Palomino's appraisal of the 70 paintings in 1694 attributed over half of these (39 paintings) and acknowledged 21 different hands (Doc. 119). These painters' real interest in painting took their appraisals of collections beyond the utility of establishing the precio justo of pictures for public sale. They seem to have gone out of their way to ensure that the documents are detailed records of the contents of Madrid collections whose dispersal by auction was imminent, and they remain as testimonies to the taste of collectors who could be numbered among the true friends of Painting. It is not surprising then that in 1724, Palomino vehemently supported a move by the Consejo de Castilla to nominate official appraisers of paintings in private collection. He suggested that these be selected from the among the corps of royal painters, to which he himself belonged, and was duly nominated for such an office.<sup>373</sup>

Antonio Palomino himself owned a collection of pictures and drawings by other artists, and in his Lives of the Artists occasionally refers to works in his own possession. Unfortunately, no inventory has been found for the artist. On the death of his wife Catalina Pérez, Palomino ordered an inventory and valuation of their estate to be drawn up.<sup>374</sup> However, this was not undertaken. On Palomino's death, his children, Francisco, Isidoro, and Rafaela Palomino, ordered that an inventory, valuation, and partition of the estate be undertaken, but this too appears not to have taken place.<sup>375</sup> However, inventories are known of the paintings in the possessions of Palomino's son, Francisco, and his son-in-law, Sebastian de Arze. Sebastian de Arze was the husband of Palomino's daughter Rafaela, and on his death drew up an inventory and valuation of their estate, beginning on 17 May, 1725.<sup>376</sup> Among their pictures were portraits of Sebastian de Arze and Rafaela Palomino painted by Antonio Palomino. Indeed, most of the attributed pictures in the document were painted by Palomino, comprising religious subjects as well as eleven landscapes by the artist.<sup>377</sup> It is unclear whether the copies of paintings by Palomino were by the artist himself.<sup>378</sup> However, there was also a copy of Van Dyck's painting of St. Rosalia, and in the valuation there was listed a painting of the Samaritan Woman by Raphael copied by Claudio Coello, although this entry was crossed out in the document. Other paintings attributed in the document were a small landscape by Pedro Cotto, a flowerpiece by Gabriel de la Corte, and two circular Dutch marine paintings.<sup>379</sup>

In this document, the fiscal of the Consejo drew attention to the practice of painters appraising at low values the best works from private collections, "sin práctica, ni inteligencia y sin conocimiento de sus autores," in order to buy them cheaply and export them, while at the same time inflating the values of low-quality works. It was proposed, therefore, to nominate one or two "pintores inteligentes en el Arte y de conocida experiencia, que con inteligencia de los Autores de las Pinturas, su calidad y vondad, las tasen y aprecian," and that they alone should appraise private collections for public sale. The royal painter and architect Teodoro Ardemans concurred with this proposal, stating that appraisers valued many originals as copies, and vice versa, and blamed the Genoese in particular for exporting "las mas clásicas" works from Spain for over thirty years. Palomino suggested that the official appraisers be chosen from among royal painters "respecto de que estos tienen ya la calificación de su ynteligencia en el arte por el título que obtienen del Rey". On 16 May 1724, Palomino and Don Juan de Miranda were nominated as official appraisers of paintings by the Consejo de Castilla. However, Jerónimo Ezquerro and other painters in Madrid protested against this monopoly, which directly infringed upon their expertise ("sciencia y habilidad") and practice as appraisers of collections. They also argued against reducing the number of appraisers to only two, in the light of the diversity and subjectivity of opinions on art ("por viniendo todo esto de ser esta arte sin número, peso, ni medida, por donde se puede estimar, apreciar, quadrar, cubicar, ni ajustar su valor por ser interminable su conocimiento") and since this also denied the traditional freedom of all painters practicing at court to value paintings.

Francisco Palomino was a painter, trained in the art of painting by his father, from whom he had evidently inherited some of the artist's materials and paintings listed in his postmortem inventory drawn up by his widow, María Felipa del Corral.<sup>380</sup> There were, for instance, 40 packets with 20 unbound copies each of Antonio Palomino's El Museo pictórico y escala óptica.<sup>381</sup> A painting of St. Catherine attributed to "Castillo" in the appraisal, for instance, is likely to refer to the work of Antonio del Castillo y Saavedra (1616–1668).<sup>382</sup> This painter from Córdoba is much praised in Antonio Palomino's Lives of the Artists, where the author describes what must be the same painting in Palomino's own collection as a single figure of the saint, with her martyrdom in the background.<sup>383</sup> Some of the important paintings in Francisco's possession were by his father; a series of four paintings of the Life of the Virgin, Flight

The heirs said that the inventory of their mother's estate was never taken, but they did not proceed with Palomino's inventory because Isidoro was not present. On 18 August 1726, it was decided to transfer the paperwork from the office of the escribano Manuel Merlo to that of Bernardo de Castro Rodríguez. It was not possible to locate the documents in the protocolos for the relevant years of these notaries.

376. AHPM, Prot. 15.557, unfoliated. Rafaela ordered the inventory on 14th May 1725, which began three days later with the collection of pictures. The following valuation of the estate is undated, with the pictures appraised first, apparently by Don Pedro de Arze.

377. The religious paintings listed as originals by Antonio Palomino in the document are as follows: Immaculate Conception; a pair of the Nativity of Christ and Adoration of the Kings; Tobias and the Angel Raphael; St. Paul Hermit; Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine; two paintings of the Assumption of the Virgin; Archangel St. Michael; St. Sebastian; four paintings of the Story of David; the Virgin; a head of St. Anastasio; a pair of SS. Gertrudis and Theresa.

378. Works described as copies of Palomino were as follows: a pair of paintings of the Child Jesus and St. John the Baptist; Christ the Saviour; Christ at Calvary before being nailed to the Cross.

379. The collection also included a small wax statuette of Nuestra Señora de las Mercedes "de mano de Callexo."

There were also five bound books of the same and six bronze plates for the prints of the volume, the other six plates belonging to Francisco's brother Isidoro Palomino, Abogado de los Reales Consejos.

into Egypt, a painting in black and white of the Agony in the Garden, an Immaculate Conception, and a black and white painted sketch (borronzitto) of the same subject, the Virgin of Sorrows, two paintings of St. Theresa, a head of St. Peter, a pair of game still lifes, a painting of a bunch of lilies, and a landscape. There were also various studies; a painted academic study of a reclining figure (una figura de academia que esta echada) and another of a nude figure standing up, a painting of some children, one of the head of a poor man, and a picture of two turkeys. Most of the paintings described as sketched in (borrones) were most probably painted by Francisco Palomino himself. The appraisal also listed a painting of St. Bartholomew by a follower of Ribera, a head of an old man by Francisco de Herrera the Younger, portraits of an unidentified queen and a marchioness by Carreño de Miranda, and a painting of Santiago in black and white by Luca Giordano, which may have come from Antonio Palomino's collection. Surely inherited from Palomino's own collection were a series of portraits of famous painters, which form a visual counterpart to his Lives of the Artists and included some of the artists he admired most. The estate documents of Francisco Palomino, then, listed two portraits of Titian, a portrait of Raphael, and one of a Ferri another of a half-length portrait of Juan Carreño de Miranda, one of Luca Giordano and a half-length portrait of Velázquez, which was probably a version of the self-portrait now in the Museo de Valencia.<sup>384</sup>

The Hanging of Pictures in Private Residences in Madrid

By the time Philip IV ascended the throne, paintings rather than tapestries and leather hangings were becoming fashionable decoration of homes in Madrid.<sup>385</sup> It was customary for visitors to be shown paintings in private houses; Cassiano dal Pozzo, on his afternoon visits to Madrid residences in 1626, recorded in his diary his impressions of some interiors.<sup>386</sup> The decoration of rooms with paintings had come to reflect the wealth and social standing of private individuals.<sup>387</sup> Paintings were also an essential consideration in properties rented to more distinguished clients, such as 15 "retablos y Pinturas" that the painter Antonio Ricci rented to Jacome de Gracia in 1598, or the works that the painter Eugenio de las Cuevas rented to Don Agustín Spínola in 1646.<sup>388</sup>

384. The portraits were listed in the following order in the appraisal document: "otro quadro de tres quartas de Alto y media vara de Ancho retrato de el Tiziano," 90 reales; "un quadrito de tres quartas de alto y dos de Ancho de un retrato de Cariño," 60 reales; "otro quadro de Vara de alto y tres quartas de Ancho de un retrato de velazquez," 120 reales; (described as "de medio cuerpo" in the inventory); "otro quadrito de dos quartas de Ancho y tres de alto de un retrato de Jordan," 20 reales; "otro quadro de tres quartas de Alto y dos de Ancho de un retrato de el Tiziano," 20 reales; "otro quadro de tres quartas de Alto y dos de Ancho retrato de rafael de urbina," 30 reales. The portrait of Ferri was listed in the inventory only; "Un retratto de Zirus ferri de tres quartas de largo y dos de ancho."

Morán and Checa 1985, p. 234, n.17; Checa 1994, p. 23, for a comment of Fernández de Navarrete, who in 1626 noted the trend for hanging paintings: "for rooms in which hangings are not placed extraordinary paintings are made, which are valued only for the fame of their authors," many of which he classed as "dishonest". Palomino (ed. 1988, p. 99), in the Life of Antonio de Mohedano, tells how the artist began by painting sargas (fabrics painted in distemper, sometimes in imitation of tapestry) and guadamecies (embossed leather), which the middle classes ("gente mediana") used to hang.

Pictures were rented to decorate the quarters of the Duca di Modena on his visit to Madrid in 1638,<sup>389</sup> and paintings were included by the Duque de Pastrana in his rental of houses to Miguel de Noroña, Conde de Linares in 1641.<sup>390</sup> While travellers to the Spanish capital remarked on the comparative modesty of the exteriors of family palaces, all were dazzled by the richness of their interior decor.<sup>391</sup> Despite its unprepossessing exterior, the Buen Retiro Palace epitomised this taste for lavish interior decoration, including large numbers of fine paintings.<sup>392</sup> In his Madrid diary entry for 26 June 1626, Cassiano dal Pozzo remarked on the modernity of the Princess of Esquilache's Madrid house, but the oddity of the lack of hangings in the rooms, the bare walls relieved only by landscape paintings and still lifes.<sup>393</sup> However, this was customary in Spain during this time of the year. Many foreign visitors to Spain in the seventeenth century noted the seasonal Spanish custom of hanging pictures in summer months and tapestries in winter, owing to the thermal properties of the latter in cold weather.<sup>394</sup> Spanish seventeenth-century inventories of private residences rarely listed the different rooms of the house in which the paintings were to be found. Pictures were inventoried along with other goods and furnishings in a continuous list, or grouped together and appraised as a separate category, although rarely with any reference to their physical location in the house. Sometimes pictures were inventoried according to their broad subject matter such as “cosas de retrato,” “pinturas de devoción,” and “a lo humano”. In inventories of larger residences the decoration of the oratory chapel was commonly identified. When the documents specify rooms, their function was only occasionally defined.<sup>395</sup> Despite their relative lack of detail regarding the physical characteristics of the pictorial decoration, notarial inventories suggest that the paintings in Spanish seventeenth-century private houses were often hung very densely, in marked contrast to the minimalist aesthetic that governs the display of individual paintings in the spare environments of homes and galleries today.

Large numbers of differently sized paintings were commonly listed in single rooms. Fine-quality paintings would have been shown to advantage, and special galleries in some aristocratic houses contained some of the owner's best works, the most famous of which were those of the Conde de Monterrey and Marqués del Carpio. Series paintings (Roman Emperors, Casa de Austria, Hermit Saints, Months, Seasons, and Elements, for instance) would have occupied large expanses of wall space. The 1628 inventory of the Granadan canon Don Juan de Matute (Doc. 14) specified that six paintings from his set of Thebaid hermits be hung in a corridor leading to the courtyard, four in a room overlooking the garden, and two in a room where water was stored in his house at Pulianas. A set of twelve Virgin Saints was said to have hung as a frieze around the upper wall of the main room of Matute's house at Granada. In the collection of Blasco de Loyola in 1670 (Doc. 85), paintings of the Four Seasons hung in the entrance hall of his house (“Reçivimiento”), and Antonio de Mardones in 1666 (Doc. 80) had also hung four landscapes in this location. In his will of 1652, the painter and dealer Francisco Berjes mentioned landscapes by Francisco Collantes that he had sold to the contador Manuel López Salcedo, some of which hung in the recivimiento of his house.<sup>396</sup> Landscapes, a ubiquitous subject, hung everywhere, often alongside other nature subjects. Still lifes, flowerpieces, and landscapes, examples of minor, decorative genres, frequently filled in spaces between figurative pictures and occupied peripheral locations, especially over windows and doors. However, religious subjects could also be hung in these locations; for instance, the Condesa de Paredes hung a painting of Mary and Joseph over a door in 1679 (Doc. 101, no. 139). The existence of especially painted pictures for the spaces over windows and doors, and even those between windows, reflects the taste of the period: filling the entirety of a room’s walls with paintings.<sup>397</sup> There is also some evidence that painted decorative friezes were used in private houses of the early seventeenth century; these were perhaps made from continuous strips of painted canvas, as in the “frisos de follaxe” listed in the inventory of Gaspar de Ledesma Meriño in 1618 (Doc. 4, no. 59), Hernando de Espejo in 1637 (Doc. 23, nos. 35 and 36), and Gil Ramírez de Arellano (Doc 3, no. 77).

Advice on the decorum of hanging paintings in private homes is given in some Italian art treatises, but is not a central concern of seventeenth-century Spanish art writing.<sup>398</sup> It is hard to detect, from the evidence of inventories at least, any specific programmatic arrangements of easel paintings in private homes.<sup>399</sup> The unique descriptions of the collections of Don Vicencio Juan de Lastanosa in his palace at Huesca, written by Juan Andrés de Uztarroz ca. 1650 and Lastanosa himself ca. 1662, confirm this observation, and reflect the great richness of interior furnishings that many collectors of the period enjoyed.<sup>400</sup> When inventories identify rooms, there appears to be no clear relationship between the range of subjects of the pictorial decoration and the function of the space, although we do not know the visual considerations that may have been a factor in the choice of images in an ensemble. The palace interior represented in Juan García de Hidalgo’s Principios para estudiar el nobilísimo y real arte de la pintura (1693) (Fig. 14) and a painting of a Neapolitan interior ca. 1670 by Michele Regolia (Naples, Colección Pisani) show rooms in which paintings cover the wall space almost entirely, and which are grouped according to a strict sense of symmetry, with larger works over smaller ones, and with complementary frames.<sup>401</sup>

Portraits of exemplary individuals were considered suitable for decorating libraries.<sup>402</sup> Obviously, religious subjects and devotional paintings were concentrated in ora-

397. These paintings were known as sobreventanas and sobrepuertas. Twelve paintings of hunts designed to hang between windows (“doce liencos que llaman entreventanas de montería y fieras”) were listed in the inventory of Jorge de Bande in 1643. AHPM, Prot. 6.219, ff. 103–104.

398. Carducho (ed. 1979, pp. 326–333) discusses the decorum of subject matter and setting in decorative schemes, as does Palomino (ed. 1988, vol. II, pp. 385–386).

tories and devotional areas of homes.<sup>403</sup> However, inventories show the prevalence of religious paintings in all parts of private houses. Devotional pictures, often precious works of art, were frequently hung in bedrooms. An image of the Crucifixion or cross was standard for the bedhead, for protection during sleep, confinement, or illness.<sup>404</sup> Many of these may have been of a type painted by artists in Madrid, in which a figure of Christ is painted onto a wooden cross.<sup>405</sup> Appropriately enough, still lifes, genre subjects, and hunting scenes hung in dining rooms in some homes of the period; in more distinguished houses conversation among guests must have frequently turned to hunting.<sup>406</sup> However, mythologies were also hung alongside religious subjects in dining rooms, where they could be admired by guests.<sup>407</sup> Family portraits and royal portraits, also hung conspicuously, were an important public expression of filial and political allegiances to all visitors.

Some published documents give an impression of random selection of subject matter to decorate private houses in seventeenth-century Madrid. In the case of the large collection of the notary Francisco Frechel, appraised in 1664 by Francisco de Zurbarán and Francisco Rizi, the most highly valued religious paintings (probably among his best works) hung in the oratory.<sup>408</sup> The dining room was also decorated with religious subjects, including one of a Vanitas with the Last Judgement, landscapes, a battle painting and flowerpiece, although no still lifes were listed here. Other documents published here, the inventories of the Conde de Solre in 1638 (Doc. 24), Nicolás de Cardona in 1643 (Doc. 37), and Francisco González de la Hoz in 1671 (Doc. 88), fail to establish a discernible pattern in the thematic arrangement of figurative narratives in these collections.

In 1651 the royal painters Angelo Nardi and Juan Bautista del Mazo valued the important picture collection of Don Francisco de Prado Bravo de Mendoza, Knight of the Order of Santiago and a member of the Supreme Council of Italy (Doc. 48).<sup>409</sup> In this document, the function of rooms was not given, and paintings of religious and profane subjects are mixed together. The first room inventoried (“sala baja questa Junto al patio”) contained three large paintings – St. John the Baptist, the Triumph of Scipio, and Caesar's Tribute – along with three religious subjects, six fruit still lifes, a still life with a porcelain vessel, and the head of an old man. Two other small rooms (“las dos alcobitas”) were decorated with religious paintings, a mythology of Cupid and Psyche, a portrait of Queen Isabella, and fruit still lifes. There was, however, some thematic consistency to the decoration of two other rooms: one was a small room (“la alcobilla questa cerca de la pieça grande de la calle”) that was decorated entirely with fruit and flower paintings, and another room before a gallery (“la pieça antes de entrar en la galeria”) contained a large Flemish bodegón, four paintings of the Creation, and four small fruit still lifes. The paintings in the gallery itself (“en la galeria que sale al patio de la fuente”) contained some of the best works, attributed to famous artists in the inventory; a large painting of Melaeagar and Atalanta by Rubens (probably a version or copy of the work from the Torre de la Parada in the Prado), four paintings depicting three Apostles in each by El Mudo, and the Tribute Money said to be by Titian (possibly a version of this subject from the Escorial, now in the National Gallery, London), as well as a Virgin and Child and 13 landscapes and fruit still lifes.

403. The collection of the notary Francisco Frechel in 1664 was made up mostly of religious subjects, with the most highly valued paintings listed in the oratory, where the altarpiece of the Crucifixion alone was worth 2.000 reales (AHPM, Prot. 8.231, ff. 100–121v; Getty Provenance Index No. E-564); see Cascales y Muñoz, Francisco de Zurbarán: su época, su vida y sus obras, Madrid, 1911.

Another document of 25 May 1652, concerning the enlargement of the mayorazgo of Don Felipe de Porres, Knight, comendador and visitador of the Order of Alcántara, and Gentilhombre de la boca de Su Majestad, included an inventory of his paintings collection (“pinturas y fabulas”) in his house on the calle de Atocha in Madrid that specified the rooms in which they were hanging.<sup>410</sup> The first section of the inventory is Porres’ oratory, furnished with religious paintings and images of sculpture, with the principal painting of the Immaculate Conception in an altar, covered with a crimson curtain. A second room was entirely decorated with a series of portraits of members of the Habsburg dynasty up to and including Philip IV, the House of Austria, made up of 14 full-lengths of kings and queens, three half-lengths and six small portraits of princes, infantes, and infantas. Seven other full lengths of Habsburg kings and queens decorated Porres’ office (“scritorio”). One gallery (“galeria”) was decorated with large paintings of the Elements and 13 medium-sized landscapes and flower paintings. A second gallery was hung with 13 paintings of fables (“fábulas”), 18 small paintings of the same type and thirteen landscapes. Here there were also maps and a painting of Madrid, a painting of South American Indians in native dress, a curious painting of a Roman madman (“Un quadro grande de Un loco que andava en roma aporreando los ytalianos”) and portraits. Four of the portraits depicted Habsburg royals, two were royal secretaries (Don Juan de Villela and Andrés de Prada), and another two were of Porres and his wife. Porres’ dining room was decorated with nine mythological paintings, listed only as “fabulas,” a genre painting of a shopkeeper selling things, a portrait of a soldier, and a small unidentified image over the window. The bedroom of Porres and his wife was decorated with religious images, and included a retable with sculpted figures of Christ and the Virgin, two crosses, and a holy water font, a large mirror, and a portrait of the Infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia.

Recreational palaces in the countryside, casas de campo, were commonly decorated with nature subjects, city views, and mythologies, as was recommended by Vicencio Carducho, who regarded the royal palace of El Pardo as exemplary in this respect.<sup>411</sup> Philip II had decorated the Pardo with a portrait gallery, mythological subjects, hunting pictures, and city views, and this “archetypal” range of subjects was amplified by Philip III’s redecoration of the palace after the fire of 1604.<sup>412</sup> Another precedent may have been the famous collection of mythological paintings owned by Philip II’s Secretary of State, Antonio Pérez, which hung at La Casilla, his suburban house in the area of Atocha in Madrid.<sup>413</sup> Mythologies, portraits, allegories of nature, genre paintings, landscapes, still lifes, and flower paintings were the prevalent themes in the hanging of easel paintings in a number of rural houses owned by private individuals in the first half of the seventeenth century.<sup>414</sup> These include the rural palace La Ribera of the Duque de Lerma outside Valladolid (1606),<sup>415</sup> Don Francisco Enríquez de Almanza, Conde de Niebla (1618),<sup>416</sup> the country residence of Don Pedro de Ocón at Baeza (1618),<sup>417</sup> that of Hernando de Espejo at Olias del Rey (Toledo) (Doc. 23). The knight and asentista Julio César Scazuola’s country residence at Tielmes, near Chinchón, was decorated with a large collection of paintings, most of which were of middling quality, and made up of landscapes, among which were paintings from Flanders and “ordinary” copies of Old Testament subjects by Pedro de Orrente, the only attributed works in the inventory, hunting scenes, seascapes, still lifes and flower-pieces, bird paintings, mythological subjects, and some religious paintings.<sup>418</sup>

411. Carducho (ed. 1979, p. 330) recommended “Si fuere Casa de campo de recreación serán mui a proposito pintar cazas, bolaterías, pescas, paisés, frutas, animales diversos, trages de las naciones diferentes, Ciudades y Provincias: y si fuere compuesto todo debaxo de alguna ingeniosa fabula, metafora, ó historia . . . será de mayor alabanza y estimación.” In the case of the decoration of Philip IV’s hunting palace, the Torre de la Parada, the king provided a memoria of the paintings. This was not, however, a blueprint of a decorative programme. Instead, mythological paintings, hunting scenes, and portraits formed a loose association of subject matter appropriate to a casa de campo and place of royal recreation. See S. Alpers, The Decoration of the Torre de la Parada, Corpus Rubenianum Ludwig Burchard, 9, London, 1971; Morán and Checa 1985, pp. 266–267;

This range of subjects was also appropriate for the pictorial decoration of garden loggie, and courtyards and patios of urban properties, although they were not exclusive to these settings and were to be found throughout the rooms of townhouses. One of the most famous gardens in early seventeenth-century Madrid was that of the regidor Juan Fernández, which was celebrated in Tirso da Molina’s La huerta de Juan Fernández (1634) and is clearly marked on Pedro Texeira’s map of the capital (1656).<sup>419</sup> An inventory of the huerta made in 1625 comprised mythologies, allegories of the Seasons and Elements, hunting scenes, landscapes, still lifes, and maps.<sup>420</sup>

417. Ocón was a canon of Toledo cathedral and mayordomo of the Archbishop, Cardinal Bernardo de Sandoval y Rojas, both of whom died in 1618. The April 1618 inventory of Ocón’s casa de campo on the outskirts of Baeza (Jaén) listed almost 100 paintings. The upstairs rooms were decorated with religious subjects, portraits, pictures of foreign dandies and ladies, and landscapes. Downstairs rooms were decorated with three large hunting scenes, a large still life (“bodegon de frutas”), and a set of 12 small still lifes. The 21 religious paintings on copper (“laminas”) were among the more highly valued pictures and, along with 15 religious subjects on canvas, probably hung in the devotional areas of the property. ## Mythological Paintings and the Nude

The Spanish royal collection was exceptional in that it contained so many fine paintings of mythological subjects depicting female nudes by Italian and Flemish artists. A taste for such images was followed by aristocratic collectors, who had traditionally owned tapestries that commonly depicted classical history and mythological themes.<sup>421</sup> However, the lack of Spanish artists who painted mythological subjects with large figures is notorious in the lore of art history.<sup>422</sup> Mythological themes, depicting, for instance, the Ovidian loves of the gods, were problematic in Spain because of the real fear that the concomitant display of nude figures in this context could morally damage the viewer. Indeed, symptomatic of these inhibitions regarding painted erotic mythology is the inquest on these undertaken in 1632 by academics from the universities of Salamanca and Alcalá,<sup>423</sup> in which it was also acknowledged that certain religious narratives required the depiction of the nude, including, for instance, Adam and Eve, St. Sebastian, and St. Laurence, and that this nudity was in fact necessary for painters to be able to demonstrate their artistic skill. There are, therefore, a number of notable female nudes painted in the guise of saints, such as Mary Magdalene by Diego Polo (Escorial) and Juan Carreño de Miranda (Real Academia de San Fernando, Madrid) and a St. Mary of Egypt like a sacred Venus painted in 1641 by Antonio Arias Fernández (Collection José Saldaña, sotogrande, Cádiz). Consequently, the academic tribunals condemned only those nudes in religious paintings that were represented with an imprudent display of nudity or in ugly poses.

While it is generally believed that it was uncommon to see mythological paintings in seventeenth-century Spanish private collections, the Getty Provenance Index database lists some 925 pictures (5 percent of paintings for which the subject is given) with mythological subjects in inventories from Madrid. Many of these depicted nude female figures of goddesses and nymphs; there are, for instance, as many paintings depicting Venus (175) listed in the database as the Immaculate Conception (163). The high incidence of such profane subjects is not surprising in court collections, which followed the example of the famous works of this type found in the royal collection and aristocratic collections.<sup>424</sup> One statistical survey of collections in the rich, cosmopolitan city of Seville, on the other hand, sampled more than 200 inventories of picture collections taken between 1600–1670 and found that of the 5,180 paintings listed in these documents, only 17 were classical subjects which probably depicted female nudes, and a mere eight of these were representations of Venus.<sup>425</sup> Not surprisingly, all of these pictures were owned by educated and upper-class individuals who were familiar with and able to appreciate the literary and humanistic content

421. Typical in this regard is the picture collection of Don Enrique de Aragón, Conde de Sastago in 1651 (Doc. 50), which, although modest in size, included paintings of Venus, Nude Venus, Venus and Adonis, Venus and Mars, Venus with dancing cupids, Europa, Diana and Acteon, Andromeda, two Bacchanals, and The Death of Cleopatra.

424. Two such collections are those of the royal secretary Juan Enríquez de Villacorta (inventoried in 1628) and Gregorio de Salazar y Salzedo, regidor of Madrid in 1629.

425. Martín Morales 1986, p. 159, table 12. Duncan Kinkad's survey of Sevillian 158 inventories between 1655–65 already adumbrated these findings. He found only 25 mythological subjects, which included depictions of nude female figures. However, some 154 paintings listed merely as fábulas in these documents, many of which were Flemish paintings, could have been mythological subjects of this type. See Kinkad, "Artistic Inventories in Seville, 1650–1699," Boletín de Bellas Artes de la Real Academia de Santa Isabel de Hungría, 2nd ed., no. XVII (1989).

of such images. There was an inversely proportional increase in the number of religious images in the inventories of the more conservative lower social classes.<sup>426</sup> It was probably in recognition of his erudition, as well for “safekeeping,” then, that Francisco Pacheco willed a large painting on copper of Venus framed in pearwood to his friend Francisco de Rioja, the learned cleric and Inquisitor of the Holy Office of Seville.<sup>427</sup>

The collection of paintings of Don Rodrigo de Herrera (1578–1641), illegitimate son of the 1st Marqués de Auñón, was remarkable even at court for the number of mythological paintings with nude female figures it contained (Doc. 33). On Herrera’s death in 1641 his collection of 66 paintings included only 12 with religious subjects, a surprising inversion of the normal proportions of subject matter in contemporary collections. And one of these was a depiction of Lot and his Daughters, which, in the hands of Italian artists, was sometimes a vehicle for the depiction of eroticised female nudes.<sup>428</sup> Herrera owned a picture of Apelles Painting the Nude Campaspe, which set the tone of the whole collection. Many of the pictures were mythological subjects depicting nude women, the stories of Venus, Danäe, Diana, and Leda. Three pictures were listed merely as women reclining on beds and in a landscape (nos. 46, 47, 51), another depicted a nude woman bathing in a pool (no. 30).

Surprisingly, perhaps, only copies after Bassano works were recognised in the appraisal of Herrera’s paintings made by the artists Antonio de Puga and Diego Polo. Moreover, comparatively few of the images were assigned their correct mythological subject. Of the three versions of Leda and the Swan in the collection, one was described in the inventory as a woman lying with a goose! (See nos. 42, 43, and 57.) This could have been a very poor quality picture or had proved difficult to see when the inventory was drawn up. While laconic descriptions of subjects are common in seventeenth-century inventories, perhaps the mistake in this case also betrays the notary’s sheer unfamiliarity with this kind of subject matter.<sup>429</sup> Only one mythology was listed as an “original” (no. 37), and this was the most valuable work in the inventory of its type. Although not always specified in the inventory entries, many of the mythologies may have been copies, perhaps after Rubens, Titian, and Correggio. As noted above, Spanish artists’ copying of Italian and Flemish models in mythological painting was perhaps a means of circumventing some of the mores attached to this genre in Spain. Some of the comparatively cheap pictures may even have derived from print sources.<sup>430</sup>

On the marriage of Philip IV to Mariana of Austria (1649), Furini’s Lot and his Daughters (Prado, Madrid) was given as a gift for the “alegría” of its nudes. While its subject matter might not be considered most suitable for the occasion, it remained in the collection owing to its artistic value.

429. For instance, in the inventory of the Marqués de Taracena in 1643 (AHPM, Prot. 6.215, ff. 16–31; Getty Provenance Index No. E-49), the mythological subject matter or identities of the gods (if indeed they were gods) are not given in the case of paintings representing “una muger desnuda y un satiro y un Cupido,” “un beneciano y una muger desnuda con un perillo,” “una muger desnuda” and “una muger desnuda y un satiro y un ang. l q le tiene de los cavellos.” In the collection of Sebastián Díaz de Ontiveros in 1639, a painting of Narcissus was listed as Adonis: “adonis mirandose en la fuente” (Doc. 26, no. 68).

430. See, for example, the large collection of modestly valued paintings owned by the notary Juan González Truxequé in 1643 (AHPM, Prot. 6.227, ff. 660–663v; Getty Provenance Index No. E-55), which included “una fabula de figuras en queros” worth only 10 reales and probably of little artistic merit.

ary arrangements for the welfare of his soul on death.<sup>431</sup> However, in one clause he stated that he owned 180 pictures, more than 30 on loan to the Duque de Osuna, and others hanging in a gallery in his own house on the fashionable calle de Alcalá. He said that he owned some very valuable pictures, but since these were “dishonest,” claimed not to have hung them. Perhaps it was fear of the collection being confiscated by the Inquisition, or perhaps it was a deeper fear for the state of his soul that made Herrera stipulate that the collection be sold in Italy, where some of his mythological paintings may have originated and more liberal tastes prevailed.<sup>432</sup> Here, perhaps, his heir, the Marqués de Auñón, could expect better prices. However, Herrera’s pictures were sold in Madrid where they were, not surprisingly, avidly snapped up by court collectors.

There is some evidence that individuals who had travelled abroad or who came from Italian backgrounds had more liberal tastes when it came to owning mythological subjects.<sup>433</sup> Thus, the inventory of Margarita Caxesi Giliogis and her husband Don Joseph de Cisneros in 1657 included two small copies of Titian mythologies and other unattributed pictures, as well as pictures of Icarus, Pallas, and Apollo by Alonso Cano and a “fable” of Venus and Cupid ascribed to “Jusepe Cano”.<sup>434</sup> Margarita’s taste for such subjects could have derived from her father, the royal painter Eugenio Caxés, who, in 1604, had copied the famous Correggio mythologies once owned by Antonio Pérez, Leda and the Swan and the Rape of Ganymede.<sup>435</sup>

While Titian’s mythological poesie were among the most famous and admired paintings of the Spanish royal collection, their depiction of nudes made them problematic. And even in royal circles there may have existed a degree of tension between the admiration of Titian’s art and the “immorality” of his subject matter in Spain. Luis Tristán noted that the saintly Philip III, “por su modestía y gran virtud,” had taken down these paintings and had his guardajoyas, Hernando de Espejo, store them out of sight.<sup>436</sup> On Cassiano dal Pozzo’s visit in 1626, he noted the custom of covering these paintings in the presence of the queen.

The reign of Philip III was marked by a particularly pious form of “official” Counter-Reformation court taste, during which time it was possible for Queen Margarita to be portrayed as St. Margaret and the Virgin Annunciate.<sup>437</sup> In 1603 Rudolph II bought the famous Correggio mythologies Leda and the Swan and the Rape of Ganymede that had been acquired for the Spanish royal collection from Antonio Pérez’s collection, but not before Philip III had Eugenio Caxés copy them. The importance of decorum, which was central to religious imagery in Counter-Reformation Spain, touched on the issue of nudity and helps to explain Philip III’s apparently contradictory response to paintings by Titian on two occasions. Titian’s St. Susan at his Valladolid quarters probably prompted the curt remark “I do not like nude paintings,” because it depicted the saint too scantily dressed.<sup>438</sup> This response is in keeping with the counter-reformatory zeal which led to the covering of the bared knee of Titian’s St. Margaret at the Escorial.<sup>439</sup> However, there is nothing inconsistent in the saintly Philip III’s delight that the mythological painting Venus and Antiope, the “Pardo Venus” (Paris, Louvre), should have been saved from the Pardo fire in 1603, since the admiration of nudes was intrinsic to the meaning and appeal of this profane genre.<sup>440</sup>

While the court of Philip IV witnessed a shift of mood, this was only a matter of degree, and Spanish inhibitions regarding mythological subjects continued to prevail. Titian’s Venus and Antiope left Spain as a gift to the Prince of Wales in 1623. However, in 1649, Alonso de Cárdenas passed over the painting, choosing instead Correggio’s Mercury Instructing Cupid before Venus (“School of Love”) (Fig. 5), from other erotic mythologies on offer from Charles I’s collection because it was less immodest than the Pardo Venus, “no es tan profana como la otra, Venus dormida y el Satyro”.<sup>441</sup> The Cardinal Infante Don Fernando, Governor of the Netherlands, especially commissioned for his brother Philip Rubens’ Judgement of Paris, and while he confessed that he admired the picture greatly, he found the three goddesses “too nude,” although this showed the beauty (valentía) of the painting.<sup>442</sup> This response was despite the fact that the picture was directly commissioned from the artist and that its very meaning depended on the discerning admiration of ideal female nudity, on the part of Paris and the viewer. While Philip’s response to the arrival of the painting is unknown, he had it covered with a small curtain in deference to its subject, and perhaps also owing to its supreme artistic quality. There was nothing unusual in the fact that the finest pictures in a collection were covered, if only to protect them from dust and damage. However, a curtain in front of a painting could offer more than protection. In this way the collector could restrict viewing of a picture to an exclusive group of intimates and connoisseurs, and add a note of theatricality to its unveiling.<sup>443</sup>

In Antonio Pérez’s great collection of mythological paintings, three of them were covered with coloured silk curtains; one was Parmigianino’s Cupid, and the others Danae and Lucretia.<sup>444</sup> The inventory of the Genoese merchant and banker Antonio Balbi in 1643 lists a painting of a nude Cleopatra that was covered with a crimson taffeta curtain, as were two pictures of nude male figures, a St. John the Baptist and another listed as St. John in the Desert.<sup>445</sup> Traditionally, the representation of the nude was a vehicle for the demonstration of artistic skill. It was acknowledged that mythologies, like religious paintings, could therefore embody the greatest artistic ambition and the highest aesthetic content. Consequently, it was not uncommon for them to be hung in the most public rooms of houses and galleries, and a number of Golden Age plays describe grand and beautiful rooms decorated with mythologies.<sup>446</sup> Don Nicolás de Cardona in 1643, for instance, was able to display his cultivation and taste by hanging mythologies in his dining room, where they could be admired by visitors and guests in his house. Although Italian treatises on art suggested that subjects pertaining to Venus and Cupid were also appropriate to the bedroom, where they stimulated desire and the conception of beautiful children, Spanish writing is noticeably silent on this matter, and inventories do not suggest that such subjects were common in bedrooms.

In seventeenth-century Spain, fine paintings with nude female figures provoked an ambivalent response. Clearly, there were many connoisseurs and collectors who acknowledged that a function of painting was to delight, as well as instruct, and who appreciated the fact that in the best erotic mythologies an intrinsic aspect of the image's aesthetic merit was its ability to evoke sensual pleasure. However, it is probably difficult today to appreciate the impact of such paintings in a severely orthodox and restrictive society, in which women went covered in public and the public display of nudity was taboo. In the treatises on art of Pacheco and Carducho, it is the religious painter who is elevated to the highest plane. Indeed, Carducho's concern with the morality of art led him to suppress from some editions of the Diálogos his regret at Fra Bartolomeo's destruction of his drawings of nudes on the instigation of Savonarola.<sup>447</sup>

Generally speaking, the vicarious sensual pleasure afforded by painted nudes was considered pornographic, morally corrupting, and sinful, and appears to have been frowned upon in wider, conservative sections of society. The erotic content of some mythological representations was considered damaging, irrespective of aesthetic merit; therefore a poorly painted Venus was dangerous, and a well-painted one much more dangerous. There were positive and negative sides to the power of painting to affect the viewer; just as religious images were stimulants to devotion, and were even endowed with miraculous properties, so there was an inverse potential to corrupt in profane works, especially among the uneducated classes.<sup>448</sup> Concern centred on the potential for social damage that resulted from the open, public display of paintings with nudes. While ecclesiastical authorities recognised the need for beautiful nudes in some religious paintings, and indeed for the glory of art itself, all were agreed on the dangers of the public display of such paintings in churches, although less clear on their presence in private collections.<sup>449</sup> At best it was felt that hedonistic depictions of this type were simply unedifying, and at worst that mythological paintings with nudes were morally dangerous and the potential cause of the degeneration of the republic, the more damaging the better painted they were.

Clearly, however, mythologies were desired by private collectors. An anonymous seventeenth-century poem describes Mercury's visit to a painter's shop, full of mythological paintings ("Ilena la oficina de tablas artificiosas todas de dioses y diosas de belleza peregrina"), in which a painting of Juno cost twice the amount of another of Jupiter, "por ser de muger".<sup>450</sup> In Alcalá Yáñez' picaresque novel, Alonso is amazed by the popularity of his master's paintings of "la casa otomana, los Empera-

The values of the paintings,  $\frac{1}{2}$  and one real, respectively, were so low as to give the poem a burlesque tone and the painter is ironically called "un insigne imaginario". This is a moralising poem against overweening self esteem; Mercury sought out his own image on earth, only to find that it came free with cheap paintings of Juno and Jupiter.

dores Romanos, los Dioses de los antiguos,” and particularly the myths of Jupiter and Venus, which he calls “tizones del infierno, exemplo de maldad, la misma soberbia, deshonestidad y torpeça”.<sup>451</sup> Instructive alternatives to these destructive images are offered, and Alonso suggests paintings of martyrs, hermits, apostles, and virgins, portraits of Habsburg monarchs and other Christian princes. Indeed, this was the opinion of the academic commission on “el abuso de las figuras y pinturas lascivas y deshonestas” of 1632, who recommended portraits of famous men and representations of their heroic virtues and actions.<sup>452</sup> These recall the portrait series of famous men which were still common in collections during the reign of Philip III, but which gradually went out of fashion in the next reign.

Many orthodox Catholic painters and collectors must have been torn between the seemingly irreconcilable demands of art and conventional morality. Given the degree of cultivation of many members of the clergy, it is not surprising that they too owned mythological subjects with nude females depicted.<sup>453</sup> And the fact that painters ran the risk of committing a mortal sin in painting nudes must have given many of them pause before representing mythological subjects.<sup>454</sup> This also helps to explain their reticence in painting erotic themes in genre paintings and the comparative restraint in depictions of the female nude in such subjects as Mary Magdalene, Temptation of St. Jerome, and The Prodigal Son. A painting of Andromeda attributed to Juan Antonio Escalante is also revealing in this regard (Fig. 15), since this is a faithful copy of a print by Agostino Carracci, with the significant difference of the voluminous drapery which covers her nudity.<sup>455</sup> In the case of a painting of The Judgement of Paris by Juan de la Corte, the artist copied the group of the three goddesses from a print by Marcantonio Raimondi but prudently dressed them.<sup>456</sup>

Effectively, prohibitions prevailed when it came to mythological paintings, and inhibited native artists from painting such subjects with large nude figures in the Italian or Flemish manner. Little is known about the activity of the Inquisition in the control of painting in this sphere, and the active suppression of paintings with nudes. Most of its attention appears to have been directed toward monitoring religious paintings, especially those sold publicly through shops.<sup>457</sup> However, in this context it is worth citing one bizarre incident which occurred in Seville in 1601, and which involved an indecent picture and a prostitute, as related in a letter of the Marqués de Montesclaros, the king’s viceroy or asistente of Seville (1600–1603). Montesclaros raided the house of a prostitute (“muger de amores”) and in the bedroom in front of the bed discovered a painting representing Villegas, a theatre director (“autor de comedias”), in Moorish costume, with his hands bound by a rope held by the prostitute, his concubine, nude with Cupid’s wings. Most disturbing and offensive of all, perhaps, was the fact that the obscene image was disguised with a mechanical frame and by a picture of the Immaculate Conception, which appears to have covered it like the lid of a shallow box.<sup>458</sup>

457. The 1632 inquest of the Universities of Salamanca and Alcalá recommended inquisitional controls and censorship for paintings in Spain, as happened in Portugal. Calvo Serraller 1981, p. 245. In 1618, for instance, Francisco Pacheco was made censor (veedor) of paintings for the Seville Inquisition, with “particular ciudadano de mirar y visitar las pinturas de cosas sagradas que estuviesen en tiendas y lugares públicos”. Pacheco, ed. 1990, p. 561. Antonio Palomino also occupied this post in Madrid. For the denunciation of paintings of archangels exhibited in the Madrid shop of Francisco de Barrera in 1634, see Jordan and Cherry 1995, p. 64. López Torrijos (1985, p. 21) cites a proposal of 1640 that painters in Pamplona nominate a veedor to monitor imported paintings coming through France, “porque algunas de ellas están prohibidas por la Inquisición o provocan a deshonestidad”. The office of the Portuguese Inquisition also operated a prohibition on such paintings entering and leaving the country.

The shortfall of mythological subjects painted in Spain was made up by foreign works, which were able to avoid import restrictions and which were also exempted from the moral objections that inhibited the practice of native painters. The paintings with nudes in the royal collection were almost all made outside Spain, and those in the collections of Spanish grandees were either imports or copies rather than original works of art. Although the collection of Catalina de Alvarado, wife of a familiar of the Inquisition, in 1669 included two mythologies, these were attributed to Italian old masters: a Perseus and Andromeda attributed to Parmigianino and a Venus and Cupid from the school of Titian.<sup>459</sup> Ironic as it may seem, it was probably copying Italian and Flemish originals that gave most opportunities to Spanish artists in painting the female nude, as had been the case with Eugenio Caxés’ excellent copy of Correggio’s Leda and the Swan of 1604. A remarkable number of mythologies in private collections at court were copies of royal paintings, and must have been painted by local artists. In the case of the Flemish artist Pablo Schepers’ commissions from the Duque de Villahermosa, he was ordered to copy mythologies of Titan as well as others of his own invention.<sup>460</sup> The 1656 inventory of Don Francisco de Haro,<sup>461</sup> for instance, included a copy of Correggio’s Leda and the Swan which was paired with a copy of Titian’s Danae from the royal collection. A large number of mythological subjects in private collections were also probably copied after Italian and northern prints.<sup>462</sup> Another method in which Spanish artists could paint mythological subjects, but circumvent restrictions and ameliorate their potentially damaging impact, was to include them as small figures in a landscape setting. This format was exploited by artists such as Juan de la Corte, Pedro Núñez del Valle, Juan Bautista del Mazo, and Benito Manuel Agüero, and the numbers of such paintings listed in inventories testify to their popularity among private collections. One such collection was that of Andrés de Villarreal in 1656, whose landscapes with erotic mythologies by Pedro Núñez were probably of small figures (Doc. 62, nos. 6 and 7).

Velázquez’s Toilet of Venus (Fig. 16) is the most famous nude in Spanish painting of the seventeenth century and is one of the most beautiful painted anywhere. Velázquez’s display of subtle poetic wit includes the detail of a white cloth which looks like the foam of a wave breaking over Venus’ hip, and which may refer to her birth in the sea. It was probably painted for the young nobleman, Don Gaspar de Haro, Montesclaros wrote that “Habiendo tenido noticia que cierta muger de amores tenía un retrato suyo deshonesto y junto a él otro su amigo, y una imagen con él puesta indecentemente, fui a su casa una noche de ronda, y haciendo diligencias y pesquisa hallé que en frente de la cama estaba una imagen de nuestra Señora de la Concepción, y dentro de ella un retrato de un hombre vestido de moro y atados los brazos con una cuerda, que tenía en la mano otra figura de mujer en cueros y con unas alas en figura de Cupido, de suerte que todo estaba cubierta con la dicha imagen, en la misma forma que una tapa de espejo cubre la luna de él, aunque tan disimulado que fue menester irle a buscar para acertar con el secreto.”

future 7th Marqués del Carpio, in whose inventory it is first recorded in 1651. The Venus was recorded in 1677 placed on the ceiling of a gallery in Carpio's Madrid palace, where it was paired with a Venetian old master painting of a Venus Reclining in a Landscape (Fig. 17).<sup>463</sup> The latter painting is representative of the type of Venetian picture that was most sought after by discerning collectors in Madrid by mid-seventeenth century.<sup>464</sup>

Even if the picture were painted during Velázquez's visit to Italy (1649–51), its idiosyncrasy might be seen as a direct response to inhibitions with regard to depictions of the female nude which prevailed in Spain. The view from the back is perhaps a concession to modesty, another twist to the theme of the Venus pudica.<sup>465</sup> Unlike Titian's lost Toilet of Venus from the Alcázar collection, in Velázquez's version of the subject the mirror reveals neither the model's features nor a frontal view of the figure, which is left entirely to the viewer's imagination. Carpio's juxtaposition of paintings of the female nude may have been meant to increase their erotic appeal, just as in Titian's poesie for Philip II, where different versions of the nude were represented in different pictures of the series. But Carpio's two paintings also invited connoisseurs of painting to compare them and to speculate on the obvious differences between them, not least of which was the qualitative stylistic differences between the "naturalism" of Venetian old masters and Velázquez's own version of reality.

The fact that Velázquez's Venus is painted from a live model may have been one of its most distinguishing and exciting aspects to contemporary eyes. The practice of using nude female models may have been common among artists of the Veneto, but was virtually nonexistent in Spain. Francisco Pacheco recommended that only the heads and hands of chaste women were to be painted from life, and that female bodies should be based on prints and classical sculpture. Agostino Mitelli and Angelo Michele Colonna, the Italian frescoists recruited by Velázquez in Italy to fresco rooms in the Alcázar with mythological scenes, complained in 1659 that they could not find female models anywhere in Madrid, a remark that perhaps also includes an ironical twist to the topos of Zuexis and the maidens of Croton.<sup>466</sup> They had been employed not only for their technical expertise as quadraturisti, painters of illusionistic decorations, but also to replace some earlier Spanish mythological frescoes which had not been to Philip's liking. Between 1641 and 1642, Francisco Camilo had painted 14 scenes from Ovid's Metamorphoses, the traditional source for the "loves of the gods" series, on the ceiling of a corridor in the West wing of the palace. Camilo was, however, a Spanish religious painter and was probably unused to such subjects, in Palomino's words "era su genio tan inclinado a lo dulce y devoto."<sup>467</sup> Philip complained that Camilo's Jupiter looked like Christ and his Juno the Virgin Mary.<sup>468</sup> Clearly, this artist had not understood nor observed the demands of decorum in mythology, since his figures were neither classical nor erotic enough.

463. In the Madrid Carpio inventories of 1677 and 1689 this picture was called Danae and was attributed to Tintoretto.

Religious Paintings

In the context of the Counter Reformation, images of Catholic militancy, such as the two paintings of the Triumph of the Church in the collection of Francisco de Prado Bravo de Mendoza in 1651 (Doc. 48, no. 39), were much rarer than straightforward pictures of Christ, the Virgin and the saints. As is clear from Pacheco's Arte de la pintura (1649), the highest calling of the Spanish artist was in the service of the Catholic faith.<sup>469</sup> Indeed, in Seville, painters were entitled pintores de imaginería, which encompassed the practice of polychroming religious statues, as well as painting pictures of religious subjects. In the case of pictures of religious narrative subjects, these "historias" represented the greatest of artistic challenges to the painter. By virtue of their subject matter, paintings of religious themes carried a great moral authority, sometimes irrespective of their aesthetic qualities. Indeed, the exalted image of the Christian artist in art theory was somewhat different in practice, with many artists obliged to produce and reproduce stereotyped devotional paintings of limited artistic value for the private market, as Antolínez's Poor Painter implies (Fig. 1).

An impression gained from reading large numbers of seventeenth-century inventories of picture collections in Madrid is that pictures of religious subjects hung in almost all of the rooms of contemporary homes. The pictures in plain black frames that decorate the entrance hall of a noble house in Juan García Hidalgo's Principios para estudiar el nobilísimo y real arte de la pintura (1693) are, as far as can be made out, exclusively religious in subject (Fig. 14). They are, moreover, large paintings with religious narratives, and thus the type of picture which occupied an elevated status within the hierarchy of images. A large Crucifixion hangs over the central door, a series of three paintings of Christ's Passion (Christ at the Column, The Mocking of Christ, and The Road to Calvary) is placed on the right wall, with a pair of smaller pictures of Christ Washing the Feet and the Last Supper on the same wall, and the vision of a cleric on the left.<sup>470</sup>

Among paintings of narrative religious subjects sampled in the Getty database, scenes of the Passion of Christ in fact occupy a significant place, reflecting the central importance of Christ as the Redeemer. All of the subjects of Christ's Passion could be the focus of prayer, and the Ecce Homo and the Crucifixion were particularly important devotional images. (See the Index of Subjects.) The numbers of images of the Ecce Homo, or Man of Sorrows, are truly remarkable. It was common to pair the Ecce Homo with paintings of the sorrowing Virgin, the Mater Dolorosa, the precedent for such pairings being the prototypes by Titian in the royal collection. This linkage depended upon the emotional rapport between the subjects and appeal to the emotions of the viewer. These were often bust or half-length images, which made appropriate pendants.

The most popular religious subjects found in inventories of picture collections in Madrid are devotional images of the Virgin, Christ, and the Saints. Paintings of the Virgin and Child were a vital focus for the devotional life of their owners, owing to the 469. Pacheco's account (ed. 1990, pp. 248–265) of the moral aims of painting and the authority it has in the Catholic church is closely based on one of the main texts of the Counter-Reformation concerning art, Cardinal Gabriel Paleotti's Discorso intorno le immagini sacre e profane (Bologna, 1582). See also Carducho's Diálogos de la pintura, VII diálogo (ed. 1979, pp. 326–376) on religious painting.

470. The plate illustrates a perspective exercise in García Hidalgo's treatise, and is most probably an imaginary interior. The mirrors with eagle frames recall those from the Salón de Espejos of the Madrid Alcázar, and the luxuriousness of the interior furnishings in this palatial setting, as well as the presence of servants, evoke a noble lifestyle.

Virgin's role as Mother of God and mediatrix, chosen by God to intercede for mankind before her Son on the Day of Judgement. Statistics underline the importance of the image of the Immaculate Conception, a particularly "Spanish" devotion painted by nearly all Spanish painters.<sup>471</sup> The fact that Spanish society was united in devotion to this particular mystery is shown by the fact that paintings of this subject were owned by all classes in Madrid.<sup>472</sup> Among connoisseurs, this image may have become a locus for the discussion of the relative merits of different artists. It is difficult to know, however, the exact reasons that led collectors to prefer, for instance, an Immaculate Conception by Juan Carreño de Miranda over one by Francisco Antolínez, a choice that could depend on quite subtle aesthetic factors and perception of the specific artistic qualities of different painters.<sup>473</sup> In a number of cases, an image of the Immaculate Conception was paired with a painting of the Annunciation, a correspondence that depended on the dual nature of Mary as immaculately conceived and as Virgin-Mother of Christ.<sup>474</sup>

There were numerous images and legends of the Virgin Mary depicted in seventeenth-century Spanish painting as the iconographic index of this publication attests. In the case of some of these paintings, the religious and mystical properties of the image may have frequently outweighed aesthetic factors. The Virgen del Carmen, for instance, had the power to redeem souls in purgatory. Another popular subject was the Virgin dressed as a gypsy, despite the orthodox view that such attire was indecorous and, indeed, despite the discrimination against gypsies in real life.

A genre of religious painting that enjoyed a considerable degree of popularity in the period, but which is little appreciated today, is of famous devotional images of sculpture in important Spanish shrines.<sup>475</sup> Owners of these paintings could, therefore, invoke the powers of these miracle-working images for the protection of the home and its occupants. Foremost among these was the image of the Virgin of Atocha, which was the centrepiece of the Madrid convent of Atocha; paintings of this image exist by Juan Carreño de Miranda (Museo del Prado, Madrid) and Andrés Smidt (Museo del Prado, Madrid). Others listed in Madrid collections included the Toledan Virgin of the Sagrario, Extramadruran Virgin of Guadalupe, the Catalanian Virgin of Monserrate, and the Valencian Virgin of Los Desamparados. Paintings of the Santo Cristo de Burgos, a Crucifixion in Burgos Cathedral, were also listed, and an example of this devotion was also painted by Carreño de Miranda (Museo del Prado, Madrid).<sup>476</sup>

Given the status of religious art as promoted in art theory of the time, it is a surprising fact, perhaps, that many paintings of religious subjects listed in seventeenth-century collection appraisals were valued at relatively little.<sup>477</sup> Indeed, the intrinsically 471. In the inventories between 1601–1699 in the Getty database, ca. 120 pictures of the Immaculate Conception are listed, with a further ca. 40 pictures listed as the "Incarnation" (a similar composition type that is the devotional image of Christ's conception, as opposed to the narrative image of the Annunciation).

472. Bravo Lozano 1981.

473. The collection of Luis de Zabalza in 1678 (Doc. 97), for instance, included pictures of the Immaculate Conception by Juan Carreño de Miranda, as well as Mateo Cerezo the Younger.

474. In the Soria Arteaga collection of 1644 (Doc. 40, nos. 4 and 5) a pair of paintings by Jusepe Leonardo represented the two divine conceptions, the Immaculate Conception and the Incarnation. This pairing was also listed in the collection of Juan de Echaz in 1687 (Doc. 113, no. 36).

475. On these, see A.E. Pérez Sánchez, "Trampanojos a lo divino," Lecturas de Historia del Arte, III, Vitoria, 1992, pp. 139–155.

476. Palomino (ed. 1986, p. 239) noted that Mateo Cerezo the Elder was responsible for many of these, which he signed, rather than his son, Mateo Cerezo the Younger.

477. The selection of documents include many such instances. In the case of Ana María de Lezama in 1678 (Doc. 99, no. 37) a painting of the Holy Family was worth far less than its frame.

elevated subject matter of these paintings alone was not sufficient to guarantee their high valuation if they were badly painted. It appears to have been common for images to be owned for their devotional value, in which the image and the particular devotion represented could matter more to clients and take precedence over exclusively aesthetic factors.<sup>478</sup> It should be borne in mind, therefore, that the low appraised values of religious paintings in collection inventories may not have compromised the devotional value that these may have had for their original owner. Put another way, for some collectors, clearly a copy or a badly painted saint could be an equally efficacious devotional image as a well-painted one. In the case of paintings owned by the lowest classes in Madrid, these were almost exclusively religious in nature, although of little artistic merit.<sup>479</sup> In terms of the mass taste to which artisan-painters of the period catered, the most common images among the lower classes were paintings of the Virgin, with the image of Nuestra Señora de la Soledad, depicting the sorrowing Virgin after the death of Christ, a particular focus for popular piety.<sup>480</sup> According to one survey, among members of the upper classes in Madrid this image was eclipsed in favour of the Madonna and Child around 1670.<sup>481</sup>

Images of the saints, the focus of prayer and meditation, reflected the devotional “taste” of their owners, especially in the case of their name saints. The importance of the saints lay in their role as intercessors and mediators, advocates (abogados) on behalf of the devout in the court of Heaven. They were prayed to in order to obtain salvation for oneself and the deceased; efficacy of images was increased in those cases of images empowered with indulgences, or the remission from penitence. Images of guardian angels, invoked in wills of the period, were also popular.<sup>482</sup> Paintings of saints were also representations of exemplary individuals, whose lives were devoted to the service of God, and, in the case of penitent saints, who exemplified the devotional practice of penance. More immediately, their presence in the domestic context was also due to the importance of saints as protectors against illnesses and misfortune. Paintings of St. John the Baptist, for instance, which were common in Madrid collections, can be accounted for by the privileged status of this saint in the saintly hierarchy and his traditional role as intercessor before Christ, in which he was second only to the Virgin. He also protected against epilepsy. St. Catherine, protector of the dying, was celebrated in the role of intercessor before Christ in the popular scene of her mystic marriage. Paintings of the visions and mystical experiences of saints and laypersons, such as St. Francis receiving the Stigmata and the Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine, enjoyed popularity among private collectors, since such subjects represented models of the individual’s spiritual ascent and the efficacy of prayer for union with the divine.

The most common saint listed in the inventories in the Getty Provenance Index database is St. Francis. As their wills make clear, laypersons in Madrid were commonly buried in habits of St. Francis for the sake of indulgences.<sup>483</sup> St. Francis was the most popular saint represented in one survey of inventories of the lower classes around 1670.<sup>484</sup> The Franciscan St. Anthony of Padua was also a common representation in homes in Madrid. The second most popular male saint recorded in our inventory sample was St. Jerome, the subject of some 250 paintings. St. Jerome, a father of the Church who translated the Bible into the Vulgate, was founder of the Hieronymites, the favoured order of the kings of Spain, whose distinguished royal houses included the Escorial, Guadalupe, and Yuste. Representations of St. James the Great (Santiago) and St. Theresa were not among the most numerous images listed in the documents, but enjoyed a prestigious position as patron saints of Spain and the dedication of the military order to Santiago. St. Joseph was also popular and made titular saint of Spain in 1679. Pictures depicting St. Isidore, the patron saint of Madrid, number slightly less than those of St. James the Great.

Among the female saints listed in the inventories, the most prevalent were Mary Magdalene and St. Catherine. The inventories testify to the particular popularity of the penitent saints, St. Peter, St. Jerome, and Mary Magdalene, who represented the virtue of repentance and the sacrament of Penance, a vital prerequisite for salvation and a particular emphasis of the Counter-Reformation church. The importance of the Magdalene is owing to her proximity to Christ and to her being the most prominent of female penitent saints. The popularity of St. Peter is also to be explained by his special status among Christ's Apostles as the "rock" on which His Church was founded, and, perhaps more pertinently, for his role as protector against fever and other illnesses. In a number of cases paintings of Saint Peter and the Magdalene formed pairs.<sup>485</sup> Many more paintings were probably made into pairs in seventeenth-century Spanish collections than are imagined today, by virtue of their subject matter or visual and physical factors, such as colour, number and size of figures, and size of paintings. From the documents alone it is possible in only a few cases to establish such relationships of subject matter; it is likely, for instance, that Antonio Balbi's paintings of Judith and Holofernes and Samson and Delilah were paired images of Jewish heroes of the Old Testament.<sup>486</sup>

Pintura Ordinaria

Inventories from the 1640s onward discovered in AHPM frequently list more than 100 anonymous pictures of comparatively low value in the estates of middle-class individuals. Such data reflects the great popularity of collecting at court and the demand on painters, and suggests that there was an appreciable pool of collectors for whom the factor of quantity and copiousness in the decoration of their houses overrode the connoisseurs' concern with artistic quality. The Getty Provenance Index database includes a number of such documents, including, for instance, the inventories of Don Francisco de Calatayud and the regidor Pedro de Rodríguez de Villarroel, both 1638, and the pictures of Juan González Truxeque, escribano de cámara, and Don Antonio de Robles y Guzmán, apostatador and gentilhombre de Su Majestad, both from 1643.<sup>487</sup> Some of the pictures in the collection of Tomás de Cardona in 1642<sup>488</sup> were designated “pintura muy comun,” and Alonso Cano called “mala pintura” 12 flower paintings in the collection of Don Diego de Angulo in 1640 (Doc 29, no. 14).

Artists of modest talent were legion in the capital, earning their livelihoods from the patronage of the artisan class and less discerning collectors. They survived by painting popular devotional images and reproductions and were probably versatile and humble enough to undertake any sort of task involving painting and decoration at the request of clients. This type of enterprise is satirized in Antolínez’s Poor Painter (Fig. 1). The religious paintings and modest clientele mentioned in the will of the painter Juan Andrés de Roble in 1614 typifies this level of activity.<sup>489</sup> Works of this ilk are usually listed anonymously in inventories, often given low evaluations, and could even be among those characterized by the pejorative label pintura ordinaria.

Painting dealers (tratantes en pintura) were the middlemen of the art market.<sup>490</sup> Francisco Berjes, for instance, was a painter-dealer who appears to have had some relatively distinguished clients on his books, such as Don José de Rosales, chaplain of the Reyes Nuevos of Toledo, to whom he sold seven landscapes by Francisco Collantes.<sup>491</sup> However, most painting dealers operated at the lower end of the market and sold inexpensive paintings to the least demanding clients in the cities and provinces. A report drawn up by the painter Diego González in Madrid in 1627, for instance, described how, for the past twelve years, he had been occupied in buying paintings from artists in Madrid and taking them for resale in provincial towns.<sup>492</sup> They supplied primed canvases and artists’ materials, and maintained their stock of pictures by regularly recruiting artists to work for piece rates much of the time copying best-selling prototypes. In 1633, the painter Reymundo Martínez agreed to pay off a debt to the “tratante de pinturas” Lorenzo Recio for five original paintings given to him, by copying any picture with four figures or fewer which Recio should supply, at a weekly rate of two canvases measuring 1½ varas, and for seven reales per copy.<sup>493</sup> In 1628, the painter Sebastián Gómez contracted to repay in paintings a loan of money from the painting dealer Juan de Argüelles.<sup>494</sup> In 1634, Argüelles drew up an inventory of his estate, occasioned by the death of his wife. His stock of paintings was first to be inventoried and was headed by 336 paintings of fruit still lifes, flowerpieces, and “heads,” as well as a set of 12 paintings of the Months, all of which were described as “ordinarios”.<sup>495</sup> Argüelles also stocked 13 landscape paintings, a picture of a crossbowman, two dozen primed canvases, and 22 religious subjects, which included seven paintings of the Virgin, three Ecce Homos, three of St. John, and three pictures of St. Francis.

Some of these dealers were artisans involved in the production of art, including goldbeaters, gilders, and carpenters, who also furnished the inexpensive paintings they sold with pine frames. One such individual was Sebastián de Mena, a gilder, who was active in the 1620s and 1630s.<sup>496</sup> Mena sold landscapes and other pictures at Albacete, where he was required to pay tax on his sales.<sup>497</sup> Jorge de Tineo, whose profession was given in the documents as “supplier of prepared canvases” (“aparejador de lienço en que se pinta”) sold primed canvases and was a supplier of religious paintings, frequently shipping works to be sold in the provinces.<sup>498</sup> He commissioned copies from artists, sold to other dealers, supplied pictures to merchants, and even gave a Madrid waterseller, Pedro González, a number of frames and paintings for him to sell on his behalf.<sup>499</sup> In 1622, Tineo, Mena and a painter Juan Bautista Sánchez, provided another picture dealer, Juan de Tores, 200 small framed paintings “que llaman ordinarios” and 100 larger framed paintings of unspecified subjects.<sup>500</sup> A painter and dealer from Madrid, one Bartolomé de Gamarra, was documented in Murcia in 1623 with as many as 500 paintings for sale.<sup>501</sup> Bartolomé de Salazar (d. 1632) was another important dealer operating from Madrid, who sold paintings in Getafe, Valdepeñas, and Almagro.<sup>502</sup> He is recorded directly commissioning pictures from artist for resale. In 1613, for instance, Francisco de Rómulo agreed to paint for Salazar three sets of 12 Sybils for the value of a writing cabinet he bought from him.<sup>503</sup> In 1627 the painter Bartolomé de Cárdenas contracted to paint for Salazar three sets of Sybils, following the design of those sold by Francisco Barrera, and eight religious subjects.<sup>504</sup> Members of other professions may also have occasionally dealt in paintings. In 1620, one Lorenzo Aguado, who was a tailor, commissioned a painter, Felipe de Bau, to paint ten pictures; two of the Supper at Emaus and two of Doubting Thomas, which were copies of works he owned, two Annunciations, two paintings of the Virgin with the Sleeping Christ Child and two paintings described as the “Virgin of the

On 23 March 1628, the contract was renegotiated and Cárdenas contracted to paint only two Immaculate Conceptions (2 x 1½ varas), one Holy Trinity, and a Coronation of the Virgin, within a month and a half (AHPM Prot. 4.568, ff. 493–494). Flowers". It is not inconceivable that in placing this order Aguado had particular clients in mind.<sup>505</sup>

Not surprisingly, many of these dealers were themselves painters who may have had more commercial success in trading in pictures than painting them. In 1628, the painter Pedro de San Martín signed a contract with another painter, Juan de Riaño, to supply the latter with flowerpieces, fruit still lifes, and pictures of saints paid at piece rates of a mere 9, 6, and 16 reales, respectively, until his advance of 1,200 reales had been paid.<sup>506</sup> The will of the painter Cristóbal de Heras shows that in 1644 he took a cartload of paintings, worth 1,600 reales, to sell at the August fair at Ocaña.<sup>507</sup> Simón de Cienfuegos (or Fogos), a Neapolitan painter, began business in Madrid as a dealer in prints and later turned to paintings. In 1620, he rented for four years an outside wall of the convent of Nuestra Señora de la Victoria in the centre of Madrid to exhibit and sell pictures directly to passersby on the street.<sup>508</sup> Andrés Carreño de Miranda sold paintings in Valladolid at the beginning of the century, and his son Juan Carreño de Miranda evidently dealt in pictures at the beginning of his career.<sup>509</sup> While young artists might well sell their works in this way, as Murillo apparently did in his youth, this was regarded as demeaning and reduced painting to the level of trade. In his Lives, Palomino recalls the cases of talented artists such as Gabriel de la Corte or Don Lorenzo de Soto, whose declining powers or personal circumstances reduced them to marketing their work in this way.<sup>510</sup> Don Francisco de Ochoa y Antolínez, however, made a decent living from selling small landscapes from the market in the courtyard of the Alcázar and other public places.<sup>511</sup>

The generally lowly social class of dealers, hawking their wares in public, made them despised by the artistic establishment in Spain, as in Italy; the nature of their retail activities was satirized by Lope de Vega.<sup>512</sup> In Cádiz, the painters' guild took action against a painter, Francisco Núñez, who had employed a mulatto to hawk his paintings around the city.<sup>513</sup> And in Madrid – as mentioned earlier – the influential court painter and theorist Vicencio Carducho had orchestrated a lawsuit against the payment of a 1 percent sales tax on paintings, which was found in the painters' favour in 1633, and which struck a blow in the ideological battle for the recognition of painting as a liberal art. While painters were found to be free from paying the tax on their own works, it had to be paid for the sale of others' paintings.<sup>514</sup> He was naturally

Riaño was to supply all canvases and pay four reales per day towards materials, and he reserved the right to specify which saints San Martín should paint and any other paintings he might request. San Martín agreed to work only for Riaño and to spend less than thirty days on any private commission that might arise during his year-long contract.

outraged by retail activities that reduced the art of painting to the level of trade and expressly blamed painters' shops (obradores, ó tiendas públicas) for bringing the art of painting into ill repute.<sup>515</sup>

For many years Francisco de Barrera and Juan de Arellano ran painting shops in front of the church of San Felipe in central Madrid, and Arellano's was well enough known to be mentioned by Palomino, who recounts how Juan de Alfaro's loss of the protection of his patron, the Almirante de Castilla, forced him into the extreme humiliation of seeking work in the painting shops.<sup>516</sup> At the end of his career, Gabriele de la Corte was reported to live in great poverty, and turned to supplying the painting shops for his livelihood.<sup>517</sup> Although Palomino recalled many such public outlets when he came to court in 1678, these shops had all disappeared by the time he published his Lives (1724), a fact which he considered beneficial for the profession of painting.<sup>518</sup>

Despite demeaning the art of painting, trade at the lower level of the art market appears to have flourished at court. Documents from the first half of the century give the impression of huge numbers of easily sold religious images and popular profane subjects such as still lifes, landscapes, sybils, and Roman emperors being reproduced in almost industrial quantities for the popular end of the market and for sale in the provinces. In 1634, the majority of the stock of the dealer Juan de Argüelles, cited above, comprised fruit still lifes, flowerpieces, and "painted heads".<sup>519</sup> In Madrid in 1616, Antonio Batalla and Miguel López contracted to paint for Lorenzo Sánchez, a painter-gilder, 66 religious subjects whose prices were set according to the size of the picture: 6½ reales for the smaller and 12 reales for the larger works.<sup>520</sup> Some degree of quality control was built into the contract in that the figures had to be to the satisfaction of the client, inspectors ("veedores"), and master painters. There is, however, no documentary evidence of paintings returned to artists because they were "badly painted".

While the court was at Valladolid, on 7 May 1611, the painter Andrés Carreño de Miranda and Juan Crespo, jewellery merchant, contracted with three different artists for a large stock of pictures, providing them with all the necessary primed canvases on their stretchers and paying set rates per picture. Thus Pedro Duarte agreed to paint 50 pictures for 16 reales each of the following subjects: 12 half-length Dominican friars, eight Saint Catherines of Siena, eight images of the Virgin with the Sleeping Christ Child, St. Joseph and St. John, four of the Virgin with the Suckling Christ Child, four images of St. John the Baptist in Prison, four half-lengths of St. Anthony of Padua, six Virgins "del Populo," two of St. Francis, and two images of St. James.<sup>521</sup> Pedro de la Fuente was to paint 42 pictures, comprising 24 portraits of Roman emperors and two sets of the Nine Infantes de Lara at 14½ reales each.<sup>522</sup> Pedro Esteban agreed to paint 190 pictures for 4½ reales each of the following subjects: five sets of fourteen pictures of the story of the apostles, five sets of twelve pictures of Virgin Martyrs, and five sets of twelve pictures of heads of Sybils.<sup>523</sup> Many of these inexpensive pictures may have been sold to other middlemen for distribution, as suggested by a document of 1609, in which Marcos López, joyero, bought from Carreño de Miranda and Miguel de Saldaña 476 paintings at half a ducat each.<sup>524</sup>

The sheer numbers of pictures in less distinguished collections did not always imply a diversity of hands. In the early part of the century, it was possible to order a large number of series paintings from a single non-specialist artist.<sup>525</sup> It was common practice of patrons ordering a juego or a lot of pictures from one artist rather than commissioning single pieces. Elsewhere it is shown that during the Duque de Pastrana's Roman embassy (1623–26) he purchased a large number of small devotional images by one Segismundo, perhaps a Northern artist in Rome.<sup>526</sup> A number of documents testify to this practice among non-specialist Spanish painters active in Madrid. The case of Hernando de Espejo ordering portraits and religious subjects from Bartolomé de González has been cited above. On 3 October 1620, Alonso de la Paz contracted with a silversmith, Antonio de Flores, to paint for him four landscapes within twelve days and within one month four religious subjects (Christ Carrying the Cross, Incredulity of St. Thomas, Virgin of Atocha and a Child Jesus).<sup>527</sup> Another document from this year details an order from Don Alonso de Perea to the painter Bartolomé Sanz for two religious paintings of the Visitation (Salutación) and a St. John, four landscapes of hunts, and four copies of pictures of the Seasons by Bassano.<sup>528</sup> In 1623 Francisco Barrera was paid for painting two sets of pictures for the household of Don Francisco de Valdés y Cardona, which comprised 12 fruit still lifes and 12 landscapes.<sup>529</sup> In 1635, a painter Juan Martínez signed a receipt for 1,446 reales from Licenciado Matías de Erbas for ten religious paintings, listed as a Nativity of Christ (“Lienco grande de figuras al natural y muchas”), the Taking of Christ, Descent from the Cross, Beheading of St. John the Baptist, the Two Trinities, the Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine, St. John the Baptist in the Wilderness, Mary Magdalene in the Wilderness, the Penitent St. Jerome, and St. Sebastian.<sup>530</sup> In 1640, a painter Benito Ruiz contracted with one Juan Martínez to paint five pictures of the Passion of Christ and to deliver them within the short space of two months, for 650 reales.<sup>531</sup> In these cases the image itself would appear to have taken precedence over the authorship of the painting, or the distinctive style of the painter himself.

The small collection of the Flemish archero Matias Carlos in 1637 comprised 17 religious subjects, three royal portraits, and six Flemish landscapes, and was valued by the archer-painter Felipe Diriksen, probably a friend and “como persona que hizo Las mas dellos y que lo entiende”.<sup>532</sup> In the 1640s Juan de Clavijo, secretary of the Council of the Inquisition, owned an Entombment of Christ, St. John the Baptist, the Virgin Dressed as a Gypsy, the Four Seasons, and four paintings of the Story of Jacob, which were all said to be by the hand of Angelo Nardi<sup>533</sup>. While it is likely then that collections included many different works by the same hand, it is an unfortunate fact that the documents only rarely identify them. Identification may have been difficult in the case of imported works and pictures by lowly painters of little artistic personality. Thus, for instance, 12 pictures in the collection of the contador Gregorio Díaz de Quevedo in 1680 are said to be merely “de una mano todas” (Doc. 104).

Sheer numbers of paintings in collections were often swelled by the great popularity of thematic series of images. Painters’ inventories show that artists kept large stocks of such ready-painted series in their studios, which implies a steady demand from anonymous clients.<sup>534</sup> Among these were Christ and the Twelve Apostles, portraits of the Spanish Habsburgs; among the most popular were the four seasons and twelve months in landscape and still-life paintings. The collection of paintings with which the Duque de Lerma had decorated his Valladolid palace of La Ribera by 1606 included many portraits and series paintings, including Roman Emperors, Sibyls, Apollo and the Muses, the Creation, Elements, Seasons, and Months.<sup>535</sup> Sets of images of the sibyls were popular subjects among educated collectors in the earlier part of the seventeenth century.<sup>536</sup> Although the sibyls of pagan antiquity were important as having partially revealed the coming of the Saviour to the Gentile world, their appeal was also that of a set of images of ideally beautiful women in fantastic costumes.<sup>537</sup> However, they rarely achieved high valuations, and many of these images were probably copied from prints.<sup>538</sup> Velázquez’s Sibyl (Prado, Madrid), which does not appear to have been part of a set, is perhaps unique among Spanish examples in terms of its supreme quality.

Sets of portraits of Roman emperors, epitomising a Renaissance taste for the classical and heroic, were still common in many collections of the earlier seventeenth century, including those of the middle classes, who clearly enjoyed the lustre of ancient imperial grandeur these images lent to a family. While such paintings gradually disappear from seventeenth-century inventories, in 1685 the Infantado Palace still displayed a set of 12 Roman emperors in the Salón Grande.<sup>539</sup> Inventories list groups of 6, 10, 12, and 15 images, either half-lengths or the even more imposing equestrian type.<sup>540</sup> Very few of these works were probably original inventions by Spanish artists; most were likely to have been copies after well-known prototypes by Italian and Flemish artists.<sup>541</sup> Prints by Antonio Tempesta were the source, for instance, of a set painted by the studio of Francisco de Zurbarán, who painted such works for collectors and the export trade with the South American colonies.<sup>542</sup> Vicencio Carducho painted a series of 141 heads of Emperors that hung in the Duque de Lerma's Valladolid palace of La Ribera and that were sold to Philip III with the collection in 1606.<sup>543</sup> Lerma's collection also included a set of 12 Roman emperors on horseback, which had been painted in Flanders "by a good hand".<sup>544</sup> These images were probably copied from print sources, perhaps those of P.G. Stradanus and Adrain Collaert.<sup>545</sup> The collection of the Duque de Lerma may have been influential in establishing this taste among collectors of his regime, such as Gil Ramírez de Arellano inventoried in 1618 (Doc. 3). By 1603 Lerma's collection included copies of Titian's 11 Roman Emperors in the Gabinetto dei Cesari of the ducal palace in Mantua, sent to Lerma by the Duca di Mantova.<sup>546</sup> Earlier, a fine set of copies of the same images by Ghisoni had been in Antonio Pérez's famous collection.<sup>547</sup> Philip IV eventually came to acquire the originals from the sale of the collection of Charles I of England, and these were exhibited in the portrait gallery of the Madrid Alcázar until their destruction in the fire of 1734.

Portraits

In Spain in the sixteenth century, a gallery of portraits of famous men (hombres ilustres) was an essential dimension to important art collections and regarded as particularly appropriate for the decoration of libraries.<sup>548</sup> These portraits were frequently inscribed with the name or title of the sitter, and depicted exemplary individuals, often of Spanish nationality, noted for their outstanding virtue, wisdom, and learning, and prowess in arms and the arts; they included Popes, cardinals and saints, kings, captains, scholars, poets, and artists, as well as illustrious family members.<sup>549</sup> Many of these images were probably copies of authenticated likenesses and could have been painted by a single hand.<sup>550</sup>

Generally speaking, during the next century such encyclopaedic pantheons of exemplary historical individuals became less common, although they were maintained intact by inheritance in some noble families.<sup>551</sup> Aristocratic collections still frequently included portraits of their peers, which were collected for their historical significance, 541. In a document of 1588, the painter Jerónimo de Mora agreed to paint Four Seasons and Four Emperors to decorate the corridors of the house of Bautista Spínola (Morán and Checa 1985, p. 238). It is unlikely that these sets of images, for a relatively unimportant area of Spínola's house, were original creations of Mora.

An extreme case is that of Miguel Vázquez painting 1,000 "retratos de pinturas profanas" for a Toledan patron, Gonzalo de la Palma Hurtado in 1600 (Morán and Checa 1985, p. 160). Juan Bautista de Espinosa, who styled himself Painter to the Duke of El Infantado, appears to have been employed to paint portraits of Infantado's ancestors for a portrait gallery (Cherry 1991, p. 68). for their family connections, and, perhaps, as a manifestation of class distinction. On his death in 1659, for instance, the rooms of the Madrid residence of the Marqués de Valparaíso were almost entirely decorated with portraits of aristocratic sitters, past and present, as well as a set of royal portraits.<sup>552</sup> Perhaps in imitation of his social superiors, the portrait collection of Gil Ramírez de Arellano (Doc. 3), like many of its time, was an expression of pride in his bloodline, and was made up of portraits of his predecessors and illustrious relatives, which culminated in his own portrait.

The numbers of portraits of non-noble sitters and their families listed in seventeenth-century inventories testify to the extent of the practice of sitting to artists, although very few can be identified today. Early in the seventeenth century, individuals could commission their own portraits from local painters for, perhaps, around 100 reales, and portraiture must have been a mainstay of many artists at court.<sup>553</sup> The fashion for portraiture even prompted Carducho's criticism of sitters from the lower classes being portrayed in an aristocratic manner.<sup>554</sup> A case in point may have been Francisco de Avila, the Duque de Lerma's barber, who commissioned his portrait from the painter Andrés Ruíz around 1622.<sup>555</sup> The painting of the steward of the Duc d'Aarschot butchering meat that was listed in the Duc's collection, however, is a remarkable example of a genre portrait in a collection in Spain of the period but may not have been a Spanish picture (Doc. 31, no. 36). A number of pictures in collections depicted painters painting portraits.

Although sitters were frequently identified in pictures listed in seventeenth-century Spanish inventories, it was, unfortunately, not the norm to identify their authors. Indeed, the identities of both are extremely difficult to establish today in the case of a number of seventeenth-century Spanish portraits of private individuals. In the case of the collector Domingo de Soria Arteaga, for instance, one sixteenth-century portrait was said to be by Antonio Moro (Doc. 40, no. 61), while those of Soria Arteaga himself and his wife were unattributed. The countryside house of the courtier Hernando de Espejo (Doc. 23 is the inventory of his Madrid house) was decorated with a set of portraits of Habsburg royalty, along with his own portraits and those of his two wives and father-in-law. The latter portraits were also listed anonymously in the inventory, and it is only an earlier document of payment for these that informs us that they were by the hand of the royal portraitist Bartolomé González. Many collectors, it appears were willing to invest substantial sums in their portraits. Pedro de Tapia owned a large collection of apparently undistinguished paintings (many valued under 100 reales), which included a set of 55 portraits of famous men, but which included a portrait of Philip III and Queen Margarita valued at the considerable sum of 500 reales, and portraits of Tapia and his wife valued at 400 reales.<sup>556</sup> On the other hand, the collection of Juan Oswaldo Brito, a secretary in the Consejo de Flandes who died in 1637, included portraits of himself and his family whose modest value (appraised at 66 reales each) suggests that they were the work of a local hand.<sup>557</sup>

Portraits of dwarves and clowns comprise one of the more intriguing facets of Spanish court portraiture, and seventeenth-century inventories of collections in Madrid list pictures of dwarves (enanos), clowns (bufones), drunks (borrachos), and madmen (locos).<sup>558</sup> Some of these paintings were burlesque images, such as a picture of a concert of dwarves and a series of 15 paintings of dwarves “in different postures” in the collection of the royal secretary Bernardo González in 1646, or a picture of a wedding of dwarves in the collection of Gabriel de Ocaña in 1666.<sup>559</sup> Many paintings of this type listed as “portraits” (retratos) in the collections of nobles and non-nobles alike were probably imaginary generic images rather than portraits of particular individuals in the strict sense of the term, and the names of the sitters were not specified. Some were probably comic images, which derived from a type of painting frequently listed in sixteenth-century inventory simply by the generic term “la risa,” referring to the humorous nature of the subject matter. In 1639, for instance, the inventory of Juan Ox, the German secretary to the king<sup>560</sup>, listed a portrait of a fool (“un retrato de una caveza de un bobo”) and a comic portrait (“otro Retrato de la Risa”), and the latter painting was probably similar to another in the collection of one Juan Pérez de Caviedes in 1641 described as a “ridiculous” portrait (“Un Retrato Ridiculo de un ombre”).<sup>561</sup>

Paintings described as portraits of clowns (bufones) were listed in a wide range of seventeenth-century collections, including, for instance, those of Don Antonio de Robles y Guzmán, apostador and Gentilhombre de Su Majestad, and Julio César Scazuola.<sup>562</sup> In 1635, the collection of the Marqués de Villanueva del Fresno included paintings of drunks and madmen (Doc. 20), while Don Fernando de Borja owned paintings of male and female clowns (Doc. 78). Cristóbal González Cossío owned paintings both of drunks and clowns (Doc. 22).

However, it is also clear from the documents that some of these images were indeed portraits of real sitters.<sup>563</sup> One of the most famous individuals of the period was Brígida del Río, called the Bearded Lady of Peñaranda, who was portrayed by Juan Sánchez Cotán (Museo del Prado, Madrid); portraits of this woman were listed in the collection of the Patriarch San Juan de Ribera.<sup>564</sup> A painting of a Roman madman who was noted for beating passersby was listed in the collection of Felipe de Porres cited above.<sup>565</sup>

The inventory of the Duque de Alcalá in Seville in 1637 listed a painting of an individual who ate everything that was placed in front of him.<sup>566</sup> The inventory of the royal notary Juan González Truxeque in 1643 included a portrait of a sitter nicknamed Pablos the Sweet-toothed.<sup>567</sup> The inventory of Francisco de Galarreta Osarez included a portrait of a moorish dwarf (Doc. 69, no. 2). The inventory of the Duque de Arcos in 1693 listed a portrait of a dwarf holding a crossbow (Doc. 118, no. 97). Two inventories from the eighteenth century listed portraits of dwarves by known artists, without identifying the sitters; Julián Moreno de Villodas in 1751 owned a portrait of a dwarf by Velázquez (Doc. 137, no. 7) and in the collection of the Duquesa de Atrisco in 1752 there was another by Ezquerria (Doc. 124, no. 125).

Royal portraits made up one of the most common type of portrait that hung in homes of private individuals in Madrid in the seventeenth century. Charles V had formed a gallery of portraits of the Habsburg royal family and, by the end of the sixteenth century, an extensive and comprehensive pantheon of royal portraits at the Pardo Palace and Madrid Alcázar exalted the Habsburg dynasty from Ferdinand and Isabella to the children of the reigning monarch.<sup>568</sup> It was natural then that so prominent an individual in royal service as Antonio Pérez should own royal portraits; his inventory of 1585 listed four portraits of Pérez and his family, and eight royal portraits.<sup>569</sup> In the seventeenth century, mini-galleries comprising sets of portraits of the Habsburgs, the so-called House of Austria (Casa de Austria), became standard in collections of nobles, courtiers, and a wide variety of private individuals in Spain. Royal portraits were de rigueur in the homes of courtiers and royal officials in Madrid, and also proliferated in collections in the provinces.<sup>570</sup> In the same way that historical portraits of famous men were viewed as edifying exemplars, able to influence the conduct of one's own life, so portraits of His Most Catholic Majesty and his wider family were seen as contemporary paragons of virtue of quasi-divine status. The eponymous hero of the picaresque novel Alonso, mozo de muchos amos (1624/25) who was apprenticed to a painter in Toro proposed portraits of the Habsburg royal family and other Christian princes as beneficial, instructive images in lieu of misleading profane mythologies and portraits of Roman emperors and Turks which were popular in the previous century.<sup>571</sup>

Such portraits were a real and conspicuous expression of citizens' political allegiances, testifying to their loyalty to crown, state, and the wider Habsburg empire.<sup>572</sup> Royal portraits were sometimes hung with images of Roman emperors to evoke the idea of modern Spain as successor to the imperial greatness of Ancient Rome, as in the case of the collection of Gil Ramírez de Arellano (Doc. 3). The will of the painter

572. In 1678 the collection of the Councillor of Castile, Don Joseph Pardo de Figueroa, contained no portraits, except a Philip IV attributed to Velázquez, which was undoubtedly a clear demonstration of loyalty to the monarch he served (AHPM, Prot. 9.851, unfoliated).

Eugenio de las Cuevas in 1646 shows that he had rented six paintings of saints and four full-length royal portraits for the decoration of Don Agustín de Spínola, who was perhaps visiting the Spanish court.<sup>573</sup> It was common for ambassadors to the Spanish court to return to their country with portraits of the royal family.<sup>574</sup> In the case of the inventory of the Dutch ambassador in Madrid, Enrique Rehede, taken in 1669, the portraits of Habsburg royals in his collection probably demonstrated the probity of his political affiliations.<sup>575</sup> Earlier, in 1628, the inventory of the royal secretary Juan Enríquez de Villacorta listed two life-sized equestrian portraits of Philip III and Philip IV, and respective portraits of Queen Margarita and Isabella of Bourbon, as well as “three pictures of hunts and in them the portraits of the royal family hunting”.<sup>576</sup> The royal secretary Antonio Carnero (Doc. 72) owned two pairs of portraits of Philip IV and Queen Isabella of Bourbon, and two portraits of his patron the Conde-Duque de Olivares. Jusepe Gómez de Arratia (1645) had served in the household of the Cardinal-Infante Don Ferdinand and owned two portraits of his patron, one of which was a print on white satin (Doc. 41, print not included in the transcription here). However, few courtiers celebrated their royal office with such aplomb as Diego Jaraba, an organist of the Royal Chapel, who possessed a portrait of himself teaching the queen to play the clavichord (Doc. 122, no. 56).

The great popularity of paintings of the royal family meant that House of Austria sets became a staple of the rank and file of painters in the capital and provinces alike.<sup>577</sup> They were also an important commodity in the export trade with Spanish colonies in South America. Although artists would have been expected to reproduce a reasonable likeness of the royal subject, none of the rank and file could have remotely hoped to paint such portraits from the life. Diego Velázquez enjoyed a monopoly on portraits of Philip IV, and portraits of the Spanish royal family were the preserve of a small, privileged number of royal painters who painted the master images that were subject to reproduction by others. Most royal portraits in private collections, then, would have derived from older images in the royal collection and officially sanctioned likenesses by royal portraitists such as Bartolomé González and Velázquez. The collection of the Archbishop of Valencia in 1611, for instance, included a set of 12 Habsburg portraits painted by Antonio Ricci and deriving from prototypes in the famous collection at the Pardo, some of which still exist.<sup>578</sup> The inventory of the military captain Don Jerónimo de Soto in 1630 also listed a full-length portrait of Philip III by Ricci.<sup>579</sup> Rubens painted portraits of the Spanish royal family in Madrid in 1628 specifically to generate copies and as the basis for prints which may also have served as prototypes for Spanish artists.<sup>580</sup> Indeed, full-length portraits of Philip IV and his queen Isabella of Bourbon after Rubens now at Stratfield Saye, Reading, England, and the Hispanic Society of New York originally formed part of the portrait gallery of the Marqués de Leganés.<sup>581</sup> An effort to control versions of the royal likeness led to the issue of some painters with a licence to paint the king, which raised a now-obscure painter such as Antonio de Salazar to the level of an “official” copyist.<sup>582</sup> In the painters’ proposal for the foundation of an Academy ca. 1619, the painting of religious subjects and portraits of the royal family were defined as the supreme duties of artists, with the consequent need for absolute propriety in their execution.<sup>583</sup> Many portraits may have been painted at great remove from accepted prototypes, and concern with the quality of portraits of Philip IV that proliferated in Madrid prompted an official survey of the studios of six painters in Madrid in 1633 and the censorship of a number of their portraits.<sup>584</sup>

Individuals who occupied posts in royal service almost invariably owned portraits of the king, his family, and the válido. Indeed, portraits of the privados the Duque de Lerma (whose privanza ran from 1598–1618) and the Conde-Duque de Lerma (1621–1643), proliferated in the collections of courtiers. Velázquez and his studio, and the workshops of other royal painters, probably capitalised on the demand for the royal image and appear to have produced reproductions of officially sanctioned prototypes for private collectors, some of which could be of considerable artistic quality.<sup>585</sup> This fact alone was enough to distinguish these images from the majority of the more popular “mass-produced” Casa de Austria reproductions.<sup>586</sup> Entries in collections inventories, however, do not distinguish between the different grades of reproduction, from autograph replicas by the master himself to those produced by the studio assistants and copyists. The collection of Don Miguel de Salamanca, for instance, included three full-length portraits of Philip IV, Isabella of Bourbon, and Prince Baltasar Carlos which were described as copies after originals by Velázquez, although the relatively low appraised value of these, six ducats each, suggests that they were studio replicas rather by the hand of the master (Doc. 63). In the same collection, however, a small portrait of the Conde-Duque de Olivares was attributed to Velázquez himself and valued at 200 reales, and this case is paralleled by that of Francisco González Cossío de la Hoz, whose collection in 1671 also included a portrait of Olivares attributed to Velázquez (Doc. 88). And what are we to make of the half-length portrait of Philip IV in an ebony frame which was said to be by Velázquez in the collection of the royal 586. An instructive case is provided by the appraisal of the collection of the Genoese Nicoleta Gentil Espinola, widow of Juan Jerónimo Espinola, by the painters Juan de la Corte and Gaspar Rodríguez. While a portrait of her brother Juan Esteban Gentil that she willed to him was valued at 2,000 reales, the set of 13 Casa de Austria portraits from Philip I to Philip IV, and that of the Conde-Duque de Olivares, were worth a mere 12 reales each. silversmith Luis de Zabalza in 1677 (Doc. 97)? It is impossible to verify these claims today in the absence of the portraits themselves. The individuals who compiled the inventories clearly considered such images of a quality consistent with the royal portraitist. While it is possible that such definite attributions to the hand of Velázquez himself simply designated the high quality of the pictures in question, it may also have been the case that these were indeed autograph reproductions of his portraits.

It appears from the inventory of Jerónimo de Villanueva (Doc. 59) that he owned reproductions of Velázquez's equestrian portraits of the Spanish royal family from the Salón de los Reinos of the Buen Retiro, and might have been the owner of a high-quality reproduction of Velázquez's equestrian portrait of the Conde-Duque de Olivares. It is not impossible that some of Villanueva's paintings entered the collection of Fernando González de Madrid Cavallerizo de la Reina and Regidor of Madrid, whose collection was inventoried in 1668.<sup>587</sup> The appraisal of González de Madrid's collection by the painter Alonso del Arco included an equestrian portrait of Philip IV which measured some 105 x 147 cm. ("una vara y tres quartas de alto y vara y quarta de ancho"), which was said to be painted "by the hand of Diego Velázquez" and was paired by an equestrian portrait of Queen Isabella by the same hand, both valued at 550 reales.<sup>588</sup> There were further unattributed equestrian portraits of the same size representing Philip III and Queen Margarita, and the Cardinal-Infante Don Ferdinand. A portrait of Prince Baltasar Carlos on horseback "by Velázquez" measured 126 x 168 cm. ("dos varas de alto y vara y media de ancho") and was valued at 400 reales.<sup>589</sup> The "family" of portraits was completed with two portraits of the Conde-Duque de Olivares, one of which was an equestrian portrait measuring some 126 cm. ("vara y media de alto") and, at 600 reales, was the most highly appraised of the group.<sup>590</sup> None, however, came near to the appraised value of González de Madrid's portrait of the Duque de Alcalá by Van Dyck, which was specified as an original and which Arco valued at 1,100 reales.<sup>591</sup> In the sale of González de Madrid's collection, remarkably, the equestrian portrait of Olivares was sold as an original by Velázquez and for more than its appraised value, bought by the painter Juan Antonio Escalante.<sup>592</sup> Escalante also bought the two equestrian portraits of Philip IV and Queen Isabella attributed to Velázquez for 400 reales.<sup>593</sup>

Another intriguing case is that of the collection of the councillor of Castile Don Jerónimo de Cuellar inventoried in 1674 (Doc. 90). Cuellar was evidently a connoisseur of some distinction and this fact, combined with his high state office, made it natural that he should own portraits of the Spanish royal family of the highest quality. In the appraisal of his paintings by Matías de Torres, this artist concurred that a pair of half-length portraits of Philip IV and Queen Mariana in festive costume were by Velázquez, and the high appraised values supported this belief (Doc. 90, no. 64). Two further portraits of Philip's daughters, the infantas María Teresa and Margarita, were also by Velázquez and worth even more, as was a half-length of the king in hunting costume, evidently a replica of the portrait which Velázquez painted for the Torre de la Parada in the mid-1630s (Museo del Prado, Madrid). The large equestrian portrait of the Cardinal-Infante Don Ferdinand (which was given an appraised value higher than any of these) was listed anonymously, but may have been a copy or version of Rubens' famous image now in the Prado, Madrid.

The practice of a small number of prominent courtiers commissioning replicas of Velázquez portraits from the artist himself can be documented in a few cases. In 1624, Antonia de Ipeñarrieta, wife of the jurist Diego del Corral (1570–1632), paid Velázquez for the portrait of Philip IV which is now in the Metropolitan Museum, New York.<sup>594</sup> This portrait is a replica of a prototype painted by the artist which was remodelled ca. 1627, but of which a number of other replicas exist, including one by another hand in the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston.<sup>595</sup> The Marqués de Leganés commissioned from Velázquez a replica of the later Prado Portrait of Philip IV, now at the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum, Boston, which is perhaps by the artist's own hand and which formed a part of Leganés' gallery of full-length portraits of Habsburg rulers, their families, and allies.<sup>596</sup> Leganés also owned a Portrait of the Conde-Duque de Olivares, which is today in the Hispanic Society of New York and which could be an original by Velázquez.<sup>597</sup> Moreover, it has been shown recently that before his death in 1628 the Marqués de Montesclaros (Doc. 13) commissioned a replica of the portrait of Olivares for his own collection of Habsburg portraits, which is probably the painting in the Varez-Fisa collection in Madrid.<sup>598</sup> It is significant in this context that in a portrait of Philip IV dating from the 1660s and attributed to Pedro de Villafranca (Museo del Prado, Madrid), the king holds a petition which is inscribed "Señor D. Juan de Góngora," in all likelihood the name of the individual who commissioned the work, Don Juan de Góngora, who was appointed President of the Council of Finance in the mid-1640s. By this simple means, sitter and patron are brought into a decorous reciprocal relationship; the king is properly shown as the pivotal centre of the state bureaucracy, holding a petition which at once signifies Góngora's own zeal in royal service and acknowledges his sovereign as the source of all preferment.

The Minor Genres

During the boom in picture collecting during the reign of Philip IV, many of the more famous artists were collected for their distinctiveness of style or subject matter. The rank and file of painters in Madrid, however, were generally non-specialists who worked in all of the genres and for whom versatility was essential in order to maintain a share in the competitive market for paintings at court. In Lázaro Díaz del Valle's notes on painting (1656–59), he frequently praised artists who were general, meaning that they worked in different mediums or painted a range subject matters in different styles. Thus, for instance, Francisco Camilo was “muý general en la pintura asi de grande como de chico”.<sup>599</sup> Others who were “general en ejercitar los pinceles,” according to this author, were Juan de Cárdenas, Luis Fernández, Sebastian de Herrera, Jusepe Leonardo, Felipe de Liaño and Juan Bautista del Mazo.<sup>600</sup> By the later seventeenth century, a changing and shrinking art market perhaps increased the need for artists to diversify their production. In his Lives of the Artists, Palomino (1724) refers to “the poverty of these times” and cites cases of skilled painters actually dying in penury.<sup>601</sup> He recounts, for instance, the case of a Cádiz painter, Enrique de las Marinas, a specialist in seascapes who preferred to work in Rome, since in Spain his exclusive concentration on this branch of painting would have been his downfall.<sup>602</sup> Gabriel de la Corte (1648–1694) is said to have remained poor because he did not know how to paint anything but flowers.<sup>603</sup> And when a client who had admired some battle pictures by Don Matías de Torres on the market called at his house and asked for “the battle painter,” the affronted artist pointed out that he also worked in the higher genres: “My dear Sir, I do not paint only battle scenes; I also paint history paintings, saints and portraits (even if they are of the devil) and will portray your honor, if he so desires”.<sup>604</sup>

While religious art was a fundamental dimension of Spanish culture in the seventeenth century, this was relieved by the essentially decorative genres of landscape and still life. The concentration of artists and collectors on genres such as landscape and still-life paintings by the mid-seventeenth century may have been a natural consequence of a restrictive artistic climate in Spain. Religious paintings were monitored by the Inquisition, and mythological subjects depicting female nudes were regarded as morally corrupting. In an artistic culture in which orthodoxy and decorum were paramount criteria, innocuous decorative paintings of landscapes and still lifes were guaranteed success. A large number of still-life paintings are recorded in the Getty Provenance Index sample.<sup>605</sup> Many of these made up pairs and sets, most often of four, six, and of up to 12 paintings, and of these examples of this minor genre only a fraction of works were attributed. Juan van der Hamen, who painted religious subjects, portraits, landscapes, still lifes, and flowerpieces, enjoyed the highest reputation among collectors as a still-life and flower painter, and he may have capitalised on his Flemish background in marketing genres that were associated with northern painting in the minds of many collectors. He was also quick to respond to the vogue for Flemish still lifes; he copied a still life by Frans Snyders within a year of its being painted and, throughout his career, painted versions of still lifes deriving from northern prototypes, such as the garland picture and serving-table still life.<sup>606</sup> As a result, the artist was commissioned to paint pendants to Flemish garland paintings for the Madrid Alcázar.<sup>607</sup> painting in his day, and attributed paintings in seventeenth-century inventories from Madrid show that landscape was an important sideline for many artists at court.<sup>608</sup> Pacheco gave comprehensive instructions for the painting of landscapes, as did another anonymous Andalusian treatise of the mid-seventeenth century.<sup>609</sup> In the memorial for the foundation of an Academy of painting presented by the painters of Madrid to Philip III ca. 1619, it was recognised that landscapes were essential to the adornment of galleries and royal palaces, and proposed that a certificate be given to graduates of the academy who wished to specialise in this branch of painting.<sup>610</sup> In his treatise on painting, Carducho acknowledged the landscape specialist (paisista) and gave the terminology associated with this field of expertise.<sup>611</sup> These paintings, like still lifes, were painted on speculation and were probably easy to sell as they appear to have been always popular among all classes of collectors. Díaz del Valle, for instance, noted that Francisco Collantes was an excellent painter and particularly in landscapes, which were esteemed in many private houses in Madrid.<sup>612</sup> From the evidence of Palomino's biographies, landscapes, battle pictures, and still lifes were commonly sold through shops and on public markets, often for relatively small sums of money, which would account for their availability to even the most modest collectors.<sup>613</sup>

Landscapes hung in all rooms of Madrid houses, and the typical oblong landscape format (apaisado) made such pictures ideal for hanging as overdoors and over-windows. They also frequently hung in sets on the walls of Spanish homes, in which cumulative decorative effects were enjoyed. The inventory of Francisco Prado Bravo de Mendoza in 1651 shows that still lifes too hung in almost all of the rooms listed, and is perhaps a measure of the strength of the private market in such "minor" genres for practicing painters at court. The inventories testify to the common practice of mixing the complementary genres of landscape and still life, sometimes on the same theme of the Seasons or the Months, in the decoration of private houses in the seventeenth century. Pacheco discussed still life, flower painting, and landscape in the same chapter, as did Palomino, under the rubric of "argumento histórico vegetativo," since these genres depicted nature themes and were related in artistic terms by the idea of the painter's imitation of nature.<sup>614</sup>

Don Francisco Ochoa y Antolínez offered sets of 6, 8, and 12 landscapes with religious scenes in this way, which were snapped up by passing clients (Ibid., p. 339). Juan de Arellano sold flower paintings from his shop, and Gabriel de la Corte sold his flower pictures on markets (Ibid., p. 326). The 1646 will of the painter Eugenio de las Cuevas shows that he had sold two landscapes to María Madalena, a servant of the Inquisitor General, for only 30 reales each (Agulló y Cobo 1981, p. 64). In the survey of the collections of lower-class individuals in Madrid around 1670 undertaken by Bravo Lozano (1981, pp. 214–216), landscapes made up the most numerous category of paintings.

In their biographies of landscape painters, Díaz del Valle and Palomino say that most of their works were found in private collections, and statistical surveys testify to the remarkable popularity of landscapes in Spanish homes of the period.<sup>615</sup> Duncan Kinkead studied the contents of 158 Sevillian collection inventories between 1655–1665. Of the 8,471 pictures listed, 7,005 were of identified subjects, more than half of which were of secular subjects. Landscapes made up over half of the number of pictures within this secular category (2,149 works), followed by still lifes, Roman emperors, and portraits. Although most were listed anonymously, Flemish pictures (169 works) were far more numerous than Italian examples (21 works), and Spanish hands included the landscape specialist Ignacio de Iriarte and (more interestingly) Bartolomé Murillo. Another study of 224 Sevillian inventories sampled between 1600–1670 by Francisco Manuel Martín Morales confirmed the numerical importance of profane subject matter.<sup>616</sup> A total of 711 landscapes also made this the most numerous secular genre of painting in these collections. Moreover, landscapes, along with still lifes (185 works), represented truly popular images in that examples were owned by individuals from all classes of Sevillian society. A study of 92 inventories drawn up in Madrid between 1668 and 1672 resulted in analogous findings regarding the popular taste for landscape paintings.<sup>617</sup> In the case of our own database, from the sample of 169 documents drawn up over the seventeenth century (1601–1700), landscape paintings, comprising 1,200 works, made up the most numerous single category of picture, followed by still lifes (860 works).

Duncan Kinkead's pioneering survey proved the importance of secular subject matter in Spanish taste of the period and laid to rest popular assumptions about the predominantly religious nature of collections. However, the bald statistical results of such surveys can be misleading, since the most numerous subjects may not necessarily have been the most significant pictures. Sheer numbers of landscape and still-life paintings in inventories should not suggest that such profane subject matters were of greater importance than religious images. The lowly status in the hierarchy of the genres that theorists assigned to landscapes and still lifes does not seem to have affected their popularity with painters or collectors. Pacheco mentioned landscape murals in classical antiquity, which were not as highly regarded as easel paintings.<sup>618</sup> In the seventeenth century, landscape painting also fulfilled a purely decorative function. Spanish documents sometimes mention the negligible aesthetic quality of pictures or the fact that they were painted in tempera, the least durable medium.<sup>619</sup> In Seville in 1635 and 1636, the painter Baltasar de Figueroa contracted to paint two lots of 100 landscapes for a client in nine months, for prices between 8½ and 24 reales depending on their size, an enterprise which would appear to militate against quality.<sup>620</sup> In the postmortem inventory of a royal notary Melchor de Rivera in 1638, four old Flemish landscapes without frames or stretchers were simply nailed directly onto the wall.<sup>621</sup> Kinkead's survey of Sevillian collections in the mid-seventeenth century found that the most frequent locations for landscapes were the courtyards of houses, over windows and doors and along corridors. Their customary placement in subordinate locations over doors and windows in Madrid also prevented too close attention to images of lesser quality. The fact that such pictures frequently hung as part of a set of images in corridors, for instance, also meant that mediocre works of art could still form an effective decorative ensemble.

Without doubt, some Spanish collectors were aware of classical precedents for landscape paintings, and the quality of these works may have been rhetorically assessed with reference to the fabled works of antiquity mentioned in ancient texts.<sup>622</sup> Pastoral landscape paintings were essentially a recreational genre, delighting the eyes and refreshing the spirits of urban viewers by evoking the pleasures of a "locus amoenus" in the countryside or garden.<sup>623</sup> A "secular" classification of all pure landscapes listed in the inventories of seventeenth-century collections, however, does not acknowledge the fact that these could have a religious dimension. Indeed, for many devout viewers landscape paintings may have been regarded as celebrations of divinely sanctified nature, the world seen as a reflection of God's wisdom and His benign and generous hand.<sup>624</sup>

One interesting term used to describe landscape paintings in seventeenth-century inventories is "paintings of distances" (lejos), which refers to the primary concern of creating the illusion of distant recession in landscape painting.<sup>625</sup> Most landscapes are listed merely as paises. Although inventories frequently seem to ignore any figurative subject matter that landscape paintings may have contained, the documents also distinguish different landscapes in a collection by reference to the figurative incident rather than the "type" of landscape itself.<sup>626</sup> The pastoral vignettes of many landscapes may be considered idyllic staffage, but viewers probably attended to religious narratives and figures of saints and hermits as the historia, or real subject of the picture.<sup>627</sup> Flemish landscape paintings with religious subjects were imported into Spain in the sixteenth century, and in 1574 Philip II hung a number of these with religious and allegorical subjects, some painted on copper, in the Galería del Rey of the Escorial.<sup>628</sup> In 1593, another 143 "paises de Flandes" for the Galería Real were made over to the

Even these negligible works found a buyer at Rivera's auction, sold to one Juan de Santamaría for 20 reales. Idem, f. 296, 18 August 1638. 622. On this question, see Marías 1989, p. 580; F. See, for instance, Fray Juan de Piñeda, Diálogos familiares de la agricultura cristiana (Salamanca, 1589), and Gregorio de los Ríos, Agricultura de jardines (Zaragoza, 1592).

625. For instance, four "lejos" were listed in the Seville collection of Don Melchor de Maldonado in 1608.

626. See, for instance, the collections of Jerónimo Valle de la Cerda in 1671 (Doc. 87, nos. 75–79), Arenberg in 1641 (Doc. 31, no. 71), and Rodrigo de Herrera in 1641 (Doc. 119, no. 32). The landscape paintings in the collection of Gaspar de Borja in 1646 include detailed descriptions of figurative incident (Doc. 42, nos. 197 and 267–268) and some description of the features of the landscape itself (nos. 178–186).

627. Doctor Benito Carlos Quintero (Templo de la elocuencia castellana, Salamanca 1620) used the analogy of a landscape with hermit to illustrate the indecorum of over-rhetorical speeches with little substance; "Como el pintor que, faltando al aprovechamiento, se entrega al regalo de los ojos, y pintando un pais de arboledas, rios, celajes, la menor parte de su obra es un anacoreta que pone en una cueva" (Herrero García 1943, p. 209). It is significant that Pacheco (ed. 1990, p. 513), in his instructions regarding the painting of landscapes, recommends that "the figure or Saint" be placed in the foreground.

Escorial collections.<sup>629</sup> A famous painting of the Flight into Egypt by Adam Elsheimer was in the possession of Giovanni Battista Crescenzi in Madrid in the 1620s.<sup>630</sup> Francisco Collantes and Juan de la Corte made a specialty of landscapes with religious narratives and hermit saints in small figures. The versatile artist Pedro Núñez painted landscape pictures with small figures in religious and mythological scenes, and the mention of these in seventeenth-century inventories reflects the esteem they enjoyed among collectors.

One very popular type of religious painting in private collections was the landscape with hermit saints, called hermitaños. Palomino mentions the landscape painter Don Lorenzo de Soto, whose series of of landscapes with anchorite saints were particularly esteemed by private collectors.<sup>631</sup> The collection of the jurado Gaspar de Ledesma Meriño, inventoried on his death early in 1618 (Doc. 4), for instance, included landscapes with saints and hermits, while paintings of hermit saints decorated the oratory of Gil Ramírez de Arellano in his inventory of the same year (Doc. 3, no. 46). In our selection of inventories, 481 paintings were listed as landscapes with hermits, and 33 of these were sets that comprised 448 paintings, one set alone numbering some 48 pictures.<sup>632</sup> The fact that only 28 images of hermits were documented in Martín Morales' survey of Sevillian collections suggests that the genre was much less popular in the Andalusian capital.<sup>633</sup>

Images of this type are generally listed anonymously in the inventories, although signed examples are known by Juan de Solís (ca. 1595–1654).<sup>634</sup> A proportion of pictures of this type mentioned in the documents were most probably imported from Flanders and Italy.<sup>635</sup> However, the only Spanish artist named for painting landscapes with hermit saints in this database is Eugenio Caxés.<sup>636</sup> Some of the paintings could have been imported, but it is likely that many were painted in Spain by local hands and they could have been reproduced from or based on the popular print series by Jan and Raphael Sadeler after drawings by Marten de Vos published between 1588–1600.<sup>637</sup> These images of hermits and saints in a landscape carry inscriptions that clarify the exemplary qualities of the figures represented and celebrate an idealised period of early Christianity, before the construction of monasteries and convents, when an Eden-like natural environment was the realm of the religious ascetic. The natural landscape was God's creation and provided solitude necessary for contemplation, soothed, comforted, and inspired virtue. The eremitical values expressed in such pictures – of asce-

For example, the paintings of Nicolas Muñoz, appraised by Pedro Perret in 1616, included "ocho payses con figuras de debocion al olio con sus bastidores" of different sizes "vinieron de milan," and worth 30 reales each (AHPM, Prot. 1.999, f. 953v, Madrid, 28 November 1616). In the holograph inventory of the collector Don Juan de Matute in 1628, he noted that his set of 12 Thebaid landscapes had been bought in Rome and that these depicted "very beautiful landscapes" (Doc. 14, no. 8).

636. For four paintings of landscapes with hermits by Caxés, see the inventory of Isabel Ramírez de Vargas (Doc. 32, no. 20). Another set of eight "paises con sus ermitaños" by Caxés were listed alongside six small fruit still lifes in 1635 in the collection of Francisco Peralta y Paternina at Corella (Angulo and Pérez Sánchez 1969, p. 234, nos. 71–78).

637. The Sadeler Solitude series comprised 108 landscapes, mostly of hermits with some saints, published in four popular editions. Although these images were not linked to any specific text, they carried inscriptions illustrating the exemplary qualities represented by the figures. For a set of pictures depicting hermitaños specifically described as being copied after de Vos, see the 1650 inventory of Agustín de Arellano and Francisca de la Torre (AHPM, Prot. 7.009, 864v–871v; Getty Provenance Index No. E-322).

ticism, prayer, study and contemplation – were particularly relevant to monastic viewers, as illustrated by the series of paintings of the history of the Carthusian order by Sánchez Cotán and Carducho.<sup>638</sup> But the vogue for images of pastoral religion among private individuals implies that they were regarded as beneficial to the wider lay audience.<sup>639</sup> Indeed, the idea of pastoral Christianity found one of its most surprising public expressions in the series of hermitages built in the 1630s in the grounds of the Buen Retiro Palace of Madrid, complete with live-in “hermits” and chapels.<sup>640</sup> These were decorated with paintings, one of whose altars contained Velázquez’s Landscape with SS. Paul the Hermit and Anthony Abbot (Museo del Prado, Madrid), and a remarkable series of paintings of anchorite subjects from painters in Rome hung in the Buen Retiro Landscape Gallery.<sup>641</sup>

In 1613, Juan Bautista Mayno painted two landscapes with St. John the Evangelist and St. John the Baptist for the predella of the altar of San Pedro Mártir (Toledo).<sup>642</sup> A further two landscapes with Mary Magdalene and St. Anthony Abbot are known and were perhaps painted for a collector.<sup>643</sup> Mayno’s landscapes are original works and are significant early Spanish examples of the “classical” landscape type being painted in Rome by artists such as the Carracci, Domenichino, and Agostino Tassi. Pedro Núñez had lived in Rome between 1613–14, where he was elected to the Academy, and may have continued the Italianate form of classical landscape in his paintings with small figures. Certainly this is implied by the extensive landscape background of Núñez’s Hagar and Ismael of 1630.<sup>644</sup>

A significant impetus was given to the vogue for landscape paintings among collectors by the pictorial decoration of the new Buen Retiro Palace in Madrid. Landscapes of the Italian and Flemish schools were prominently displayed in the palace, alongside works by Spanish artists. The 1701 inventory of the Retiro listed more than 270 landscapes of all schools, some of which decorated entire rooms.<sup>645</sup> In the Retiro were concentrated examples by three of the best-known Spanish specialists of the day, 33 pictures by Pedro de Orrente and 22 works by Francisco de Collantes in the private quarters and others by Juan de la Corte; this royal example probably enhanced the reputation and popularity of these artists among collectors at court.<sup>646</sup> The Almirante de Castilla dedicated a room in his palace to the paintings of Orrente and had another entirely decorated with landscapes.<sup>647</sup> The paintings inventoried at the Buen Retiro included works by Juan Wildens and seascapes by Andries van Eervelt, and a large number of unattributed landscapes at the Buen Retiro may also have been Flemish.<sup>648</sup>

Some older types of allegorical landscape images, such as paintings of the Months and Elements, were brought from the royal palace of Valladolid.<sup>649</sup> In the concerted campaign to decorate the palace (1633–40), many landscapes were acquired from Madrid collectors by the king's agents; Giovanni Battista Crescenzi, for instance, sold 12 Italian landscapes, a series of the Plagues of Egypt by Orrente was acquired from the Marqués de Villanueva del Fresno (Docs. 20 and 28) and Suero de Quiñones supplied marine paintings. Even Velázquez is documented selling four small landscapes to the king.<sup>650</sup> The most important group were the two sets of large landscapes commissioned in Rome from Claude Lorraine, Poussin, Lemaire, and northern artists such as Both and Swanevelt, one set comprising anchorites and the other pastoral scenes. Twenty-three of the anchorite landscapes and 22 pastoral scenes were installed in a long gallery of the west wing, whose thematic consistency has led to its being called the Landscape Gallery.<sup>651</sup>

In the hurried decoration of the Retiro, series of landscapes made ideal cover for the large expanses of bare wall in the new palace, particularly over doors and windows. Landscapes were considered suitable decoration for the Retiro, a large recreational palace with extensive gardens on the outskirts of Madrid. By the time Carducho (1633) recommended landscape paintings as appropriate décor for rural houses (casas de campo) the practice was traditional.<sup>652</sup> Indeed, an early example of this is the frescoed ceiling decoration of the Gabinete de la Reina of the Pardo Palace outside Madrid painted by Jerónimo de Cabrera in 1613. Here, the main narrative paintings from the story of Esther and Ahasuerus are complemented by the Virtues, Signs of the Zodiac, the Four Seasons, and 12 landscapes of the Months in the lunettes.<sup>653</sup> This form of decoration probably derived from Italian models, since landscapes were painted as mural decoration in Spanish palaces by Italian artists by the 1580s. Romolo Cincinnato frescoed rooms in the Infantado palace at Guadalajara, and the Roman specialist Cesare Arbasia painted illusionistic landscape views at Córdoba Cathedral and El Viso del Marqués.<sup>654</sup> In Madrid, a gallery that gave on to the outside in the house of Don Pietro de' Medici was painted by Patricio Cascesi ca. 1596 with hunting scenes (“escenas de montería y caza”).<sup>655</sup> In the urban environment of the capital, landscape paintings probably evoked in viewers a nostalgia for nature and rural pleasures, and their appeal to collectors was probably complemented by much pastoral literature on the theme of the rural idyll of the period.

In Spain, as in Italy, landscape was a genre associated with the meticulous “naturalistic” style of Flemish artists, and northern painters were long recognised for their ability to render natural appearances in rich detail. Spanish collectors probably associated the genre with Flemish expertise because large numbers of landscapes painted by northern artists were traditionally exported to the Spanish market from Flanders and Rome.<sup>656</sup> In 1569–1570, Licenciado Juan de Ovando asked Benito Arias Montano, in Antwerp, to supply him six landscapes for his study with a few, small figures and by a good hand.<sup>657</sup> In Arias Montano's reply, he asked Ovando to specify the amount he wished to pay "porque al precio es la perfección dellos," and reminded him that the more expensive landscapes could be seen at close quarters and further away, while the cheaper ones looked well only from afar.<sup>658</sup> Such imports continued throughout the seventeenth century and are sometimes registered in the libros de pasos of the Cámara de Castilla; in 1641, for instance, the Condesa de Feria imported a box of paintings from Flanders which comprised religious pictures, portraits, works on copper, and 17 landscapes, a group of 16 of the latter described as "ordinarios".<sup>659</sup> Pacheco acknowledged landscape as a Flemish specialty and did not mention any Spanish landscapists by name. He cited three Flemish painters of snowscapes active in Seville and Hendrick Vroom (1566–1640) as a specialist in seascapes and sea battles.<sup>660</sup> Particular mention was made of Paul Bril (1554–1626), whom he distinguished for his "great inventiveness and rich and cheerful colour" (varon de mucha invención y caudal y alegre colorido).<sup>661</sup> Bril worked in Rome in his later career and painted many small landscapes on copper which were popular among collectors throughout Europe. His works were also engraved and widely imitated. In 1618, for instance, the collection of Gaspar de Ledesma Meriño included a landscape with pilgrims by Bril and a copy of one of his pictures, along with a landscape by Orrente (Doc. 4). Bril's landscapes were present in the royal collection, and the collections of Spanish aristocrats and members of the middle classes.<sup>662</sup>

By the middle of the seventeenth century, Flemish landscape paintings were extremely common on the Spanish market. Artists in Antwerp and Brussels, capitalising on this taste, regularly exported their works to Spain. From 1623 to the 1640s, for instance, Chrisostoom van Immerseel, a Flemish merchant based in Seville, imported large numbers of Flemish paintings, and landscapes made up an important part of these consignments, including works by such artists as Jan Brueghel II, Joos de Momper, and Jacques van Uden.<sup>663</sup> Imported Flemish landscapes were often listed in Spanish inventories as paises de Flandes and almost invariably formed series of images (although some were listed as individual pictures in collection inventories). This generic term derived as much from the fact that such pictures represented the landscape of northern Europe as the style in which they were painted. While this was a semi-anonymous genre in which mediocre paintings abounded, it is unlikely that many Spanish collectors would have recognised the authorship of even high-quality works by the many Flemish specialists in the genre. Thus, a landscape by the Antwerp specialist Jan Wildens, which was recently on the art market in Madrid, was listed in the Marqués de Leganés's inventory of 1655 as "Un paisico de uno de amberes."<sup>664</sup> In the case of the inventory of the collection of the Conde de Molina in 1675, however, a number of Flemish hands were identified among his landscapes, perhaps reflecting the fact that these were signed and held in high esteem in the collection (Doc. 93).

Flemish seascapes were popular in Madrid, a city landlocked at the very centre of the country, and may have appeared exotic to Castilians who had never travelled to the coast. Surprisingly, in collections in the port city of Seville, they appear to have been much less popular.<sup>665</sup> The trading interests of the merchant Cesar Buenvecino living at court perhaps gave him a more particular interest in seascapes and ship paintings.<sup>666</sup> Images of naval battles and storms may have conjured up the worst nightmares of collectors involved in overseas commerce, such reversals of fortune perhaps even serving as a kind of warning. In 1640 a consignment of 70 paintings recently imported from Flanders and belonging to the royal asentista Julio César Scazuola consisted of 64 landscapes and seascapes, five religious subjects, and a genre painting of a woman with fruit.<sup>667</sup> Scazuola owned property outside Madrid in the town of Tielmes which contained a collection of pictures of lesser quality than the works decorating his Madrid residence, and which was made up mostly of landscapes, at least six of which were Flemish.<sup>668</sup> These paintings were brought to Madrid and valued by Jusepe Leonardo who designated many of them ordinarias, including 14 copies of Old Testament subjects by Pedro Orrente in poor condition (algunos dellas quebradas y la pintura maltratada), and identified six landscapes that were cruder than others (mas toscos y de peor mano), six of hermit saints as relatively worthless (de poco balar), and another six that were sketchily painted or worn (la pintura es abreviada). Among the paintings owned by Melchor de Rivera, a notary, in 1638 were four old Flemish landscapes that were pinned to the wall, without stretchers or frames.<sup>669</sup>

As has been suggested above, Pedro Orrente's success among Spanish collectors was partly due to his imitating the almost universally admired landscapes with rustic figures of the Bassano family of artists. In an analogous way, the continuing wide-spread popularity of paises de flandes among collectors in Spain probably prompted artists in Madrid to claim a share of this market by painting Flemish-style landscapes, or at very least to copy these pictures and even Flemish prints.<sup>670</sup> In Carducho's Diálogos (1633), a real view of the Manzanares river at Madrid reminded the Disciple of paintings by Paul Bril, while the Master acknowledged that landscape painters at the

The painter Jusepe Leonardo valued his paintings (ibid., ff. 1046v–1049v) and the paintings imported from Flanders for his collection ("setenta Liencos que ultimamente binieron de flandes para el dho Julio cesar scazuola," ibid., ff. 1067v–1068v, 6 February 1640). All of the figurative paintings were listed as "copies". Six pictures were large seascapes (puertos de mar y nabios de tres baras escasas de ancho y bara y media de alto), eight paintings were landscapes with hunting scenes, and 50 were landscapes ("payses"), six of which were small landscapes described as "Pintura ordinaria".

These also included mythological subjects (Bacchus, Diana and Acteon, Venus and Adonis, Cephalus), religious paintings and a genre picture whose description recalls Flemish works and which was the most highly valued picture in the lot (un lienço de un Jabali y un benado y una figura de hembra y tiene una Langosta con un ceston de ubas de dos baras y quarta de alto y dos escasas de ancho, 1,000 reales).

670. Pérez Sánchez (1993, pp. 178–179) cites an exact copy of a Flemish landscape painting by Matías Jimeno in the Prado Museum. Jusepe Martínez (ed. 1988, p. 231) gives the example of the painter Pedro Urzanque copying landscapes from prints.

Spanish court would cause the best Flemish artists envy.<sup>671</sup> Francisco de Collantes became a highly successful specialist in the genre of landscape, whose style and subjects appear to derive from northern models rather than the observation of the Castilian landscape; his paintings, in turn, were also widely imitated.<sup>672</sup> Juan van der Hamen, whose name and background were Flemish, painted Flemish-style landscapes for private collectors.<sup>673</sup> Antonio de Pereda, who had Flemish family connections, appears to have done so too and may have painted his Flemish-style mountain scene around 1636, when he sold two small landscapes for the Buen Retiro collections.<sup>674</sup> Juan de la Corte, a Fleming who had been trained in landscape in the north, was a very popular artist at court despite his limitations as a figure painter.<sup>675</sup> A whole host of artists of lesser talent could have based any number of landscapes on northern prints and have sold these to undiscerning clients at the lowest end of the market.<sup>676</sup>

In his house at Huesca, the collector Don Vincencio Juan de Lastanosa hung many landscape paintings by Spanish masters, including Pedro de Orrente, Cristobal de Vargas (“el Sevillano”), and Francisco de Collantes, as well as local artists Pedro de Urzanque and Miguel de San Juan.<sup>677</sup> Moreover, in one room Lastanosa hung a series of convex mirrors that reflected the real landscape outside and brought this into the interior.<sup>678</sup> The landscape backgrounds of Velázquez’s portraits may have looked more “realistic” to viewers in the 1620s because of the contrast with Flemish landscapes that represented the norm in Madrid.<sup>679</sup> Some landscape painters were reported to have worked from nature, the prolific Cordoban painter Antonio del Castillo and Don Lorenzo de Soto making drawings from the motif.<sup>680</sup> However, landscape paintings appear to have been appreciated as imaginative evocations and generalised natural scenes. Thus, Palomino admired José Antolínez’s landscapes for their great beauty and imaginative qualities (“capricho”).<sup>681</sup> His pupil, Alonso dela Barco, “pintor paisista,” is said to have made excellent and skilled landscapes entirely “from memory, without looking at anything, with such variety and beauty that it was a wonder”.<sup>682</sup> A distinctively different style of landscape painting initiated by Velázquez and based on Italian prototypes was typified by the work of Juan Bautista del Mazo, who painted topographical views and imaginary subjects, and his pupil Benito Manuel Agüero, who was particularly inspired by the classical landscapes of Claude Lorrain.

were listed in Spanish collections, but the loss rate for such a fragile medium appears to be extremely high.<sup>684</sup> Views of royal palaces were also painted in the 1630s by Spanish artists, although Mazo's depictions differed in their emphasis on royal gardens and court life.<sup>685</sup> However, urban views were painted in Spain and are listed in seventeenth-century sources. Juan de la Corte appears to have made a specialty of these, and works by him exist today, such as the Plaza Mayor with Juego de Cañas (Madrid, Museo Municipal). A view of Toledo by El Greco was inventoried in the Madrid collection of Doctor Pedro Pacheco (Doc. 71), along with 16 views of cities in Flanders.

Some collections in the period were made up almost entirely of landscapes, and a number of these appear to have made up sets of works. In 1622, for instance, the pictures of Don Francisco de Alarcón, a knight of Santiago and member of the Council of Castile, comprised 85 landscapes, some of which were Flemish, which represented the Seasons, fables, hunting and fishing, and hermit saints.<sup>686</sup> In 1662, 139 landscapes, "perspectives," and battle paintings numerically made up more than half of the 207 pictures in the collection of Doctor Pedro Pacheco, a member of the councils of Castile and the Inquisition in 1662 (Doc. 71), which was appraised, appropriately enough, by the landscape painter Benito Manuel Agüero. While most of these were listed without an author, some were Italian and Flemish pictures, and there were landscapes by Cajés, Collantes, Pedro Cotto, and Núñez. In this collection it was possible to see landscapes with animals attributed to the Bassano and the "Spanish Bassano" Pedro Orrente, and an undoubted rarity was the View of Toledo attributed to El Greco. The inventory of 1661 of Don Francisco de Aponte y Chaves reflects this collector's remarkable taste for mythological and classical subjects and landscapes.<sup>687</sup> His paintings were also appraised by the landscape painter Benito Manuel Agüero, who did not give attributions, except for four small landscapes "which contain the gypsies of Calot". Valuable works depicting scenes from the Trojan Wars (The Rape of Helen, Burning of Troy), the story of Dido and Aeneas, and the Judgement of Paris recall subjects painted by Juan de la Corte and Francisco Collantes. Another 50 paintings were listed as landscapes (paises), which included architectural settings, ruins, and two seascapes, and whose subjects included saints and mythological scenes. The collection of Manuel Monje in 1677 comprised some 24 landscapes and 12 "perspectives" by Italian, Flemish, and Spanish hands, which included works by Agüero's pupil, Don Lorenzo de Soto (ca. 1634–ca. 1688). Palomino notes that Soto was of noble birth and based his landscapes on drawings from nature. While sets of his landscapes were popular among private collectors, Palomino also describes how a decline in quality of

684. The collection of Pedro Pacheco (Doc. 71) included 26 views of Flemish towns, and six paintings of named Flemish towns were listed in the collection of Francisco González Cossío de la Hoz (Doc. 88). These represent an older genre, and one which was more common in sixteenth-century collections.

his later work led to a corresponding decline in the calibre of his clientele, until the artist was reduced to selling his pictures on the street.<sup>688</sup>

The documents list landscapes by such well-known figure painters such as Caxés, Núñez, and Antolínez, which are unknown or unrecognised today.<sup>689</sup> More common, however, are works listed by artists who cultivated a specialty in landscape and “perspectives,” some of whom are all but unknown today; Pedro de Orrente, Francisco de Collantes, Manuel de Azevedo, Pedro Cotto (“El Mallorquín”), Cristóbal de Vargas (“El Sevillano”), and Juan de Solís. An entry in the 1643 inventory of capital of Don Alamo de Parada y Mendoza lists “Mas tres paisés de collantes dos de rruelas Dos de lanchares Uno de açevado,” in which the name of the landscape specialist Francisco Collantes appears next to those of the figure painters Juan de Roelas (?) and Antonio de Lanchares, and the now obscure landscape specialist Azevedo.<sup>690</sup>

The landscapes of Juan de Solís and Manuel de Azevedo were undoubtedly popular with collectors, who were able to order pictures directly from them. In 1623, the escribano Francisco Enríquez commissioned Manuel de Azevedo to paint eight large landscapes in which the narrative subject (historia) was to be of the patron's choice, a clause which implies that Azevedo's landscapes could accommodate different figurative subjects according to the individual requirements of clients.<sup>691</sup> In the same year, Juan de Solís contracted to paint for Don Luis de Mendoza, mayordomo of the Duque de Pastrana and knight of the Order of Alcántara, 12 landscapes, made up of four of hermits, four of gardens and fountains (“payses y fuentes y casas”), and four with hunting scenes (“payses y montería”).<sup>692</sup> An important clause in the document stipulating that these be by Azevedo's own hand was intended to guarantee the quality of the paintings. In contrast, in 1628 the landscape painter Cristóbal de Vargas Colmenar sold his landscapes through the shop of Francisco Barrera, with whom he contracted to supply pictures for a piece rate over a period of two years.<sup>693</sup> Francisco Collantes may also have worked for Barrera in 1630, and it may have been common for artists who painted landscapes and still lifes to sell their works through dealers and shops.<sup>694</sup> Sale by private commission, however, was the most prestigious means of working and which, at least in theory, could allow most creative freedom. Thus Collantes' works were sought out by the collector Francisco Merchant de la Cerda, who commissioned landscapes from the young painter for his own remarkable collection of pictures by

It is unclear from the documents whether the painter referred to is Manuel de Azevedo, who was brother of the Toledan painter Luis de Tristán and a landscape painter in Madrid who sold landscapes for the Buen Retiro, or Cristóbal de Azevedo, mentioned by Díaz del Valle as landscape specialist. Enríquez was not legally bound to accept the works if for whatever reason he was unhappy with them, even if they were to be declared perfect by other painters.

693. AHPM, Prot. 4.568, ff. 616v–617v, Madrid, 10 April 1628. Vargas contracted to paint only for Barrera for two years and his pictures to allow his pictures to be sold through his Cassa y tienda. Barrera agreed to pay Vargas 20 reales for pictures of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  x 1 varas and 24 reales for pictures of  $1$  x  $1\frac{1}{2}$  varas which depicted landscapes with hermits and single figures (Y esto se entiende de hermitaños de figuras sueltas). Vargas was to receive 64 reales for each painting of 2 varas in size, which depicted landscapes with narrative subjects (que An de ser Paisés de istorias). Barrera had paid Vargas 572 reales on account of the primed canvases which he was to supply him; those of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  varas at 6 reales;  $1\frac{1}{2}$  varas at 8 reales; those of 2 varas at 20 reales.

living artists. In a 1628 document, Collantes was paid by Merchant de la Cerda for a painting of the Assumption of the Virgin, and contracted to paint for him two landscapes, one with ruins and the other with trees, mountains, and figures.<sup>695</sup> These paintings were still in Merchant de la Cerda's collection when it was inventoried in 1662, nearly thirty-five years later.<sup>696</sup>

Landscapes are not usually described in documents; in the case of artists who enjoyed a reputation as specialists in the genre, their names appear in the documents much like trademarks. Pictures listed as paises de Orrente could have been painted by the artist or followers, such as the Madrid painter Mateo de Orozco (active 1634–1652), and would be typified by Bassanesque rustic landscapes, with or without a religious subject.<sup>697</sup> Battle paintings were the specialty of Juan de Toledo, called El Capitán because he had been a soldier, and their actual appearance was almost never recorded in the documents. The development of this genre too may owe something to the importation of foreign examples onto the Spanish market.<sup>698</sup> Earlier in the seventeenth century, battle paintings by the Flemish specialist Sebastian Vranckx were considered too expensive for the Spanish market, and Spanish versions may have been cheaper and sold better.<sup>699</sup> In the collection of Don Gregorio Ortiz de Santecilla, a knight of Santiago, in 1676 (Doc. 95) a battle picture by Toledo worth 30 ducats was paired with a copy of a work by the renowned Italian specialist Aniello Falcone, which was worth 10 ducats more. Battle paintings which appear in the inventories of nobles and knights, such as Don Juan de Casteñeda in 1694, might reflect a romantic nostalgia for the military role that had traditionally distinguished their caste.

Scenes from the story of Troy were extremely popular among court collectors, as testified by the numbers in seventeenth-century inventories. A complete cycle of easel paintings of the story of Troy were commissioned from Juan de la Corte by the Conde de Villalcázar de Sirga for his residence at Málaga; remarkably, they are still in situ.<sup>700</sup> The Burning of Troy was the most painted subject from classical history in Spain, and was a specialty of the painters Juan de la Corte and Francisco de Collantes.<sup>701</sup> For contemporaries, these hellish images may have carried sobering reminders of historical catastrophe and reversals of fortune. In pictorial terms their appeal depended upon 695. AHPM, Prot. 5.247, ff. 105–106v, Madrid, 10 March 1628. By this document, Collantes agreed to repay Merchant de la Cerda a loan of 220 reales and a further 59 reales that he had overpaid him for “un lienzo de nuestra ss(ñora) de la asunzion con los doce apóstoles” (2½ x 1½ varas). He was also to paint him “dos liencos de dos paises uno de Ruinas y otro de Arboles y Penas” (2½ x 1½ varas) “que Cada uno tenga su ystoria diferente hechas de mi mano a satisfacion y Contento del dho fran(cisc)o de la cerda”. The paintings were to be completed within two months and were to cost 40 ducats for the pair. Collantes was unable to sign the document, and his age was given as 24 years old. On 18 January 1632, Collantes contracted with another private patron, Don Francisco de la Hoz Villegas, to paint a St. Jerome and a St. Peter (1½ varas), within one and a half months, for 300 reales. This document bears the comparatively crude signature of the artist. AHPM, Prot. 5.248, unfoliated. These are the only known archival documents for this artist published to date. Curiously, a year later, when Collantes appraised the small number of religious paintings left on the death of one Francisca González de Sepúlveda (wife of Pedro González de Sepúlveda, Inquisitional notary), he did not sign the document because he said he did not how (AHPM, Prot. 5.956, ff. 8v–9, Madrid, 29 December 1633).

the amount of dramatic incident and the number of small figures in these scenes. The belief that the management of light effects in night scenes were a greater challenge to the artist's skill probably ensured such subjects a place in the collections of discerning connoisseurs.<sup>702</sup> In the Madrid Alcázar a large painting of the Burning of Troy appropriately hung over a fireplace.<sup>703</sup> Two large and expensive paintings of the Burning of Troy and the Banquet of Mark Anthony and Cleopatra were in the collection of the Marqués of Montesclaros (Doc. 13), and were acquired from his almoneda by the wealthy Genoese merchant and banker Pablo Justiniano in 1628 (Doc. 19).

Juan de la Corte and Francisco Collantes were widely admired specialists in scenographic paintings with small figures, depicting themes from the Bible, mythology, and classical and modern history. A battle painting by Juan de la Corte is listed in the collection of Gaspar de Ledesma Meriño in 1618 (Doc. 4); he seems to have enjoyed a reputation with such paintings from an early date. He also made a specialty of paintings of topical contemporary scenes, such as his 'Juego de Cañas' in the Plaza Mayor (Madrid, Museo Municipal). The patronage of private collectors must have been the mainstay of the careers of Collantes and De la Corte, and Díaz del Valle and Palomino note that their works were to be found in many "casas particulares" of the court.

The inventories reflect the increasing popularity in the second half of the seventeenth century of a specialist category of pictures known as "perspectives," which denoted subject pictures with small figures in elaborate architectural settings. Perhaps the importation of works of this type by specialists in Italy caused more native painters to take up the genre. Six perspectives by Didier Barra, called Monsú Desiderio in Spain, were listed in collection of Don Fernando de Tinoco in 1652 and are among the earliest documented in a Spanish collection (Doc. 54). Manuel Monje's collection boasted a set of 12 perspectives from Palermo (Doc. 96). The paintings of Viviano Codazzi were extremely popular in Spain among those collectors who could afford them, such as Ana María de Lezcama, widow of Joseph Pardo de Figueroa, Consejo de Castilla 1678 (Doc. 99, no. 6), and Joseph Márquez de Escalante, Presbítero y Ayuda de Oratorio de la Reina 1680 (Doc. 103, no. 1).

Earlier in the century, Juan de la Corte had a reputation for such works. De la Corte combined a perspective setting with portraits of the royal family in one large painting (Keir, Stirling Maxwell Collection), which may have been the work that headed the 1646 inventory of the collection of Juan Siburi y Espinola, the Genoese wife of Don Juan Hurtado de Tapia, a royal accountant.<sup>704</sup> Around the middle of the seventeenth century, Lázaro Díaz del Valle particularly noted the expertise of Francisco de la Corte and Francisco Gutiérrez as painters of perspective.<sup>705</sup> Gutiérrez appears to have been one of the most popular practitioners of the genre in the second half of the century.<sup>706</sup> In 1665 Gutiérrez valued two of his own works in the collection of Ana María de Peñaranda most highly of all (Doc. 76). His works were esteemed enough by the widow of a royal secretary, who took them with her into retirement in a convent in 1698.<sup>707</sup> His pictures were sometimes composites from foreign prints, the figures lifted from Cigoli, for instance, and architectural settings from manuals of perspective, such as that of Hans Vredeman de Vries.<sup>708</sup> Despite the fact that they derived from other images, they were often works whose size, complexity, number of figures, and sheer amount of labour made them comparatively more expensive than many pure landscapes. While many of these paintings remain in the storerooms of galleries today, or are exhibited as curiosities, they represent an important aspect of taste for paintings in the seventeenth century which is proved by their incidence in inventories of contemporary picture collections.

A GOLDEN AGE OF COLLECTING

Marcus B. Burke

The Reigns of Charles V and Philip II

The accession in 1516 of a “foreign” monarch, Charles of the Austro-Burgundian house of Hapsburg (who was soon to be Holy Roman Emperor as well as king of Spain), injected an international orientation into Spanish collecting at the highest level.<sup>1</sup> Charles’s youth was spent in Flanders, but his taste was oriented toward Italy, at least after his political and military career had brought him into contact with the High Renaissance.<sup>2</sup> In time Charles became an important patron of Titian as well as the Leoni, artists who would continue to be favored under Philip II.

Whether we can consider Charles to have been a “picture collector” is somewhat more problematic. Modern art collections tend to place painting, graphic art, and sculpture into a category separate from the “decorative arts,” but this was not the case in Spain in the later Middle Ages and early Renaissance. Paintings were among several types of precious objects placed in the care of the guardajoyas, or “keeper of the royal treasures,”<sup>3</sup> and there is no indication, as in Florentine collecting by the fifteenth century,<sup>4</sup> that works of “high” art and the artists who made them enjoyed a higher status than, for example, jewelry and the artists who made it. We do not know if Charles shared this attitude, although his commissioning tapestries after cartoons by Jan Cornelisz van Vermeyen instead of a series of paintings to celebrate the victories in the campaign against Tunis suggests a lingering medieval frame of mind.<sup>5</sup>

Even if Charles was not a “picture collector” as such, it is nonetheless certain that he possessed a large picture collection, albeit one scattered among the various cities in Europe where the peripatetic monarch held court. In Spain alone Charles owned

1. The history of collecting in sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century Spain is still being written, although recent studies by J. Miguel Morán, Fernando Checa, Angela Delaforce, Jonathan Brown, Barbara von Barghahn, and Sarah Schroth have provided both the essential framework of the phenomena and a host of useful details.

2. See H. Trevor-Roper, Princes and Artists: Patronage and Ideology at Four Habsburg Courts, 1517–1633, New York 1976. Trevor-Roper’s insistence on the Flemish aspect of Charles’s taste may be overstated. For example, his palace in the Alhambra at Granada and the upper story added to the interior court of the Alcázar at Seville are Italianate in style. A proper study of the history of Charles’s taste has yet to be made.

3. According to a description of the household of Charles V presented in the 1570s or 1580s by Jean Sigonney, Comptroller of the Household to Philip II, the guardajoyas was one of a number of court officials supervising various aspects of the royal possessions. These included the royal clockmaker, ornamental ironworker, tapestry conservators, and silversmith. The aposentadores, or officials in charge of the maintenance, furnishing, and supply of the Household, were a separate department. Madrid: Biblioteca Nacional, ms. 1080. (I am indebted to Profs. Jonathan Brown and John Elliott for bringing this manuscript to my attention.) See also the discussion on the palace duties of Velázquez under Philip IV in J. Brown, Images and Ideas in Seventeenth-Century Spanish Painting, Princeton 1978, pp. 94–96.

4. See the memorandum written in the 1470s by Giovanni Rucellai of Florence, who lists the important pictures in his family’s collection by artist’s name only. According to C. Gilbert, Italian Art 1400–1500: Sources and Documents, Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 1980, pp. 110–111, Rucellai’s list is the first inventory of a private art collection that is a “collection” in the modern sense of the word. Rucellai’s inventory is published in translation by Gilbert on p. 112.

5. The Tunis tapestries and van Vermeyen’s designs have been studied by H. J. Horn, Charles V’s Conquest of Tunis: Cartoons and Tapestries by Jan Cornelisz Vermeyen, Ph.D. dissertation, Yale University, 1977; published as Jan Cornelisz Vermeyen, painter of Charles V and his Conquest of Tunis, Doornspijk 1989.

more than 600 paintings. Madrazo notes the 470 paintings inherited from Queen Isabella; a collection of more than 100 paintings, plus 40 not inventoried, which came to Charles from his aunt and guardian, Margarita of Austria; and additional paintings belonging to his mother, Queen Juana, and therefore (presumably) to his grandfather, King Ferdinand.<sup>6</sup> To these may be added hundreds more in foreign centers and yet others commissioned during his reign.<sup>7</sup> By the time of Charles's death, moreover, painting and sculpture had begun to acquire the pre-eminence among the arts which they have since enjoyed. Indeed, the change to a more modern attitude toward painting finds its terminus ante quem in the events following the emperor's demise.

Together with his Flemish, Spanish, and Italian dominions and worldly goods, Charles had bequeathed an enormous burden of debts to Philip II, who therefore had to decide which parts of his royal inheritance were worth preserving and which could be sacrificed to keep the estate solvent. At the almoneda, or public sale, which followed the settlement of Charles's will in 1571, Philip bought in all the paintings and certain jewels of importance for Hapsburg imperial history and gave up most of the other valuable objects.<sup>8</sup> Apparently Philip found the symbols of his family's suzerainty and the picture collection more important than the other treasures of the crown. Already made aware, by virtue of his travels, of the wider world of European art, Philip would soon develop into one of the most important connoisseurs, collectors, and patrons of his age.<sup>9</sup> By the time of his death, Philip had given more than 1,000 works to the Escorial alone.<sup>10</sup>

Philip's appreciation of fine pictures was neither unique nor unprecedented, even in the history of patronage in Spain. Rather, his decision to keep his father's collection intact was the result of cultural forces that had been gathering strength throughout Europe for many decades. Among the most important of these forces were the influence of Humanism and Neoplatonism,<sup>11</sup> the vast increase in the amount of theorizing about art that took place in the Renaissance,<sup>12</sup> a greatly enlarged knowledge of ancient literature, artistic practice, and aesthetic values,<sup>13</sup> and Renaissance princes' desire to harness the social power of art to political ends.<sup>14</sup> The result was an important role for the arts in Renaissance society and politics, as well as a marked increase in the material rewards and social status enjoyed by painters and sculptors.<sup>15</sup>

13. This is especially true of the uses to which the "ut pictura poesis" concept was put. Renaissance aestheticians used the relationship between painting and literature, which Horace formulated as a tool for literary criticism, as a means of elevating the social value of the visual arts. See R. Lee, "Ut pictura poesis: The Humanistic Theory of Painting," in The Art Bulletin, 22, 1940, pp. 197–269 (also published separately). H. W. Janson, in History of Art, New York 1969, pp. 277–279, notes that Boccaccio had also used a similar concept when he spoke of Giotto's having raised art to a status not held since antiquity. In Janson's analysis, Boccaccio was using Giotto's popularity to bolster Petrarch's new Renaissance-consciousness.

The first peak in this artistic ascent was reached in 1533, when Charles V made Titian a Count Palatine and Knight of the Golden Spur. As Levey has noted, Titian's achievement is even more notable for having been the result of his skill as a painter instead of some other quality or service.<sup>16</sup> In addition, Charles V's desire to play Alexander to Titian's Apelles had actually preceded their first meeting: it was Titian's works themselves that commended him to the emperor.<sup>17</sup> It is no surprise, then, that Charles's son came to value both Titian and Titian's works so highly. But many years would pass before the royal admiration for painting was translated into an improved social status for Spanish painters. Not until the late seventeenth century, when collecting pictures was well established as an aristocratic pastime, did Spanish painters at last achieve recognition as artists rather than craftsmen.<sup>18</sup>

One final explanation of Philip's preservation of his father's pictures lies in the role these paintings played in royal propaganda. Along with his collection, Philip inherited a strong family tradition of using the arts to glorify the state, exemplified by commissions such as Dürer's allegorical prints for Maximilian I and the already-mentioned Tunis tapestries of Charles V.<sup>19</sup> Indeed, Charles went so far as to bring the designer of the tapestries, van Vermeyen, along on the North African campaign as a sort of "battlefield artist".<sup>20</sup> The Wunderkammer of Rudolph II (Hapsburg cousin to Philip II and Holy Roman Emperor, 1576–1612) was both an expression of imperial magnificence and a symbol of the emperor's claim to power.<sup>21</sup> Previous rulers of Renaissance Spain had been equally aware of the value of artistic propaganda. One may cite the triumphal arch that Alfonso V of Aragon built after 1453 to commemorate his conquest of Naples, the projects of Alfonso's successors in southern Italy, and the buildings with highly political decorative schemes that the Catholic monarchs built on the Spanish mainland.<sup>22</sup> While still a prince, Philip II had enlisted the arts to support his claim to inherit the Holy Roman Empire.<sup>23</sup>

Two other actions of Philip II were to influence Spanish collecting in the next century: the importation of Italian artists (the so-called escurialenses) to decorate his monastery-mausoleum-palace at the Escorial, and the establishment of Madrid as the fixed capital of Castile and (implicitly) the other nations ruled by Spain. At the Escorial, Philip established the precedent of turning to Spain's non-Iberian possessions, especially Italy, for certain types of artistic products: in his case, for large-scale decorative programs and frescoes, to which secular subject matter would be added in the next century. Indeed, in bringing the Italians to Spain, Philip may be said to have secured an Italian foundation for the development of the seventeenth-century Spanish school of history and religious painting, just as his having brought Antonis Mor to the Iberian Peninsula added Netherlandish influence to Spanish portraiture.<sup>24</sup> Both Flemish and Italian influences were present in the architecture of the Escorial and Flemish art was heavily represented in Philip's picture collection.

In architecture the movement from the Plateresque style, with its intensely decorated portals and windows separated by areas of blank wall, to the severe, somewhat mannered classicism of Charles V's palace at Granada and the Escorial, may be thought of as removing decoration: hence the term estilo desornamentado. The interior of the Escorial was, considerably less "unadorned" than the exterior, although, oddly, in spite of the remarkable amount of scholarship directed at Philip II as patron and collector at the Escorial, there is confusion about the exact scheme of decoration that existed during his lifetime. Of course, many sections of the complex – the library, the Hall of Battles, the sacristy cloister – still preserve original frescoes. Similarly, fragments of the secular decoration, such as highly decorative intarsia doorways, still survive, although these have apparently been moved from their original locations.<sup>25</sup> The use of tile dados also suggests a controlled sumptuousness with much closer ties to the Plateresque and to earlier mudéjar traditions than the severe exterior would suggest. Pictures would have added greatly to the effect, just as they do today in the royal apartments and the museum areas. Philip had a great many pictures; if we add his own works kept at the Escorial to the more than 1,000 he deeded over to the institution, we arrive at an enormous figure.

In the long run, the establishment of the court at Madrid would prove even more important for the arts, since the previous system of moving the court among many locations in Old and New Castile necessarily dispersed royal patronage instead of focusing it on one spot. The peripatetic court was also a symptom of the crown's relative weakness in relation to the great noble families, a political balance that the Hapsburgs continually sought to overturn to their favor throughout the sixteenth century. Nevertheless, although both Charles V and Philip II selectively excluded the grantees from the centers of power from the time of the Comuneros onward, their potential presence in a national (and indeed, an international) capital at Madrid eventually resulted in a great concentration of patronage and collecting there once the members of the aristocracy began to re-assert themselves under Philip III and Philip IV.

For these reasons – not to mention the concentration of documents in the Madrid archives – this study has focused on Madrid. Let us therefore pause in our historical survey to make some observations about life in the capital during the Golden Age.

The Urban Environment: Madrid in the Seventeenth Century

Although geographically central to the Iberian Peninsula, Madrid in many other ways is ill suited for a major national capital. Situated on an arid plateau with an uncertain water supply, it had an extremely irregular topography and, at the time of Philip II's ascension, almost no monumental buildings other than a cramped fortress-palace, the Alcázar. Thus, when Philip decided to move his court from Toledo to Madrid in 1561, the selection seems to have represented, as Brown and Elliott have put it, "the triumph of policy over plausibility."<sup>26</sup> Indeed, Philip himself found it necessary to retire to the foothills of the Guadarrama mountains to build his major monument, the Escorial, although he also sponsored construction at the alcazares of Madrid and Toledo, the El Pardo Palace, and elsewhere. Perhaps because Philip's patronage was focused on the Escorial, Madrid never developed into a real metropolis under his leadership, although it became of necessity something of a boom town. Philip II's successor, Philip III, and the new favorite, the Duke de Lerma, attempted to move the court to Valladolid in 1601, but eventually returned to Madrid in 1606.

In spite of heroic efforts during the reign of Philip IV, the Alcázar of Madrid remained an awkward, uncomfortable residence, while the new summer palace built in the 1630s, the Buen Retiro, was a hastily constructed, sprawling affair distinguished more for its gardens and interior decor than for its exterior façades. The houses in the town were even worse: since there were no convenient sources of stone or lime, many dwellings were essentially adobe structures.<sup>27</sup> Only the Plaza Mayor, initially built from 1617 to 1619 under Philip III and Lerma's patronage by the architect Juan Gómez de Mora,<sup>28</sup> had any sort of monumental aspect, although it was eventually joined by distinguished individual government buildings, such as the court jail, and a number of fine churches built during the reigns of Philip IV and Charles II.

Many noble Spanish families (the Duques de Infantado and their Mendoza relatives, the Marqueses de los Vélez, along with the Alcalás and Lerma) had built significant palaces in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, but none of these was located in Madrid. The return of the grandees to the center of power under the leadership of Lerma, Olivares, and Haro was therefore a return to an urban environment in no way prepared to receive them. Perhaps because so many of the grandees were of Valencian, Toledan, or Andalusian origin – all three areas have a strong Moorish aspect – the nobles who came to Madrid also seem to have stressed the interiors of their dwellings, which were often modest mudéjar brick structures with stone portals and trim, arranged around or set in small huertas, or gardens.

Indeed, the garden pavilion seems to have been especially popular with collectors. Duque de Lerma's garden can be seen in the map of Madrid ca. 1630 by De Wit (now in the Biblioteca Nacional). The Conde de Monterrey also, had a house with garden on the Prado de San Gerónimo across from the Buen Retiro (that is, on the modern Paseo del Prado, where the Banco de España now stands), which Gómez de Mora had expanded to include a picture gallery opening onto the boulevard, somewhat in the manner of the Frick Collection in New York.<sup>29</sup> (Apparently, Monterrey, like Frick, sought to enable some form of public access to his private museum.) According to a contemporary account, Monterrey's sala, or main gallery, was 120 feet long and decorated with the finest of the Monterrey canvases.<sup>30</sup> The grounds were set about with ancient statues and casts after the antique, acquired during his service in Italy.<sup>31</sup>

In contrast, the palace of Monterrey's brother-in-law, Don Luis de Haro (the 6th Marqués del Carpio), was composed of a series of smaller houses, as was often done at Toledo and, at Valladolid from 1601 to 1606 in order to provide a residence for Philip III. Don Luis's son, Gaspar de Haro (7th Marqués del Carpio), followed his uncle Monterrey's example and built as his principal residence a garden pavilion (which he called "mi jardín," or "my garden") on the site where the Palacio de Liria and its gardens now stand (as we have noted, the Carpio and Alba estates were merged in the early eighteenth century).

Like Monterrey's garden house, Don Gaspar's house seems to have been conceived as a museum, and this may also have been true of the house and collection of the ninth Almirante de Castilla, whose son, the tenth almirante, rearranged the palace as a series of exhibits based on the attributions of the pictures displayed in each room (see the introductory remarks to Docs. 43 and 117). The Imperial German ambassador, Ferdinand Harrach, wrote in 1674 that when he visited the tenth almirante he was stunned by the collection, the interior decor, and the garden, but unimpressed by the exterior architecture of the palace, which, like that of Monterrey, was located on the Prado de San Gerónimo, and including, like that of Monterrey, a gallery.<sup>32</sup> In short – and in contrast to Italian cities such as Venice, Genoa, and Naples – Madrid was a city of interiors, some arranged as private museums.

Moving from the greatest nobles down to the next level of society – lesser aristocrats, prelates, highly placed court officials, commanders of military orders or holders of similarly lucrative positions, other wealthy hidalgos, and particularly wealthy commoners – we find that only a difference of scale separated their homes from those of the grandees. Marcelin Defourneaux has sketched out the typical Spanish townhouse of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, with its entrance hall, or zaguán, on the ground floor and the reception rooms on the piano nobile, beginning with an antechamber and followed by a series of drawing rooms (estrados), including, in the wealthier households, a grand salon, or estrado de cumplimiento, for important occasions.<sup>33</sup>

Some idea of what these interiors looked like may be derived from an engraving published in José García Hidalgo's Principios para estudiar el nobilísimo y real arte de la pintura [1693] (Madrid 1965) (Fig. 14). Although we must be careful not to assume that García Hidalgo was depicting an actual interior (some of the furniture suspiciously resembles pieces known to be in the royal palace), his engraving does allow us to make some generalizations about interior design and the role of pictures. The room seems to be a vestibule of some kind, since the door appears to open onto either the street (as it would in Madrid) or a patio (as in Seville or Valencia). The rich decor, however, suggests a salon or receiving room of some importance, so that we may apply his visual evidence to the estrados on the principal floor of larger houses as well: note that the woman in the central doorway raises a curtain to reveal what may be a room of similar size beyond, so that the room depicted may have been intended to be understood as one of a series. Paired Spanish secretaries (vargueños) with their trestle stands (puentes) and a larger Flemish or Italian-style secretary, as well as chairs for guests, make up the furniture. Other than a few pieces of ceramic over the door, the decor otherwise consists entirely of pictures, in this case edifying religious subjects in keeping with García Hidalgo's exemplary program. To judge from the inventories recorded here, a wealthier noble household, or even the royal palace, would have had more of these rooms, with certain ones distinguished by especially fine decoration in keeping with some special function or other importance. Less prosperous houses would have had smaller or fewer rooms, decorated with smaller or less expensive pictures. García Hidalgo's image is misleading on two points, however, since there are no portraits and no landscapes. (We know from the inventories that portraits were common in at least the aristocratic households and that the great majority of collections, from the king's down through those of commoners, contained landscapes, usually Flemish.) Nevertheless, it can easily be seen how the pictures in such a room could be used to infer certain qualities of their owner: their devoutness, career, or particulars of family genealogy, for example.

On 30 May 1674, the Duque del Infantado sponsored a gala in honor of the feast of San Fernando (p. 95). Harrach also cites the works by Titian in the Royal Collection (p. 87), along with tapestries and statues, some of the latter being copies after ancient works.

Sixteenth-Century Noble Collections

The collections of the great nobles under Philip II have only recently begun to be studied. Perhaps because of their secondary political role, the grandees tended to absent themselves from court, remaining for long periods at their seigniorial estates, surrounded by cliques of retainers.<sup>34</sup> As a result, documentation of art collections for this period is more scattered and more difficult to access than that for the seventeenth century.

Stirling-Maxwell has suggested that the Duque de Alba's collections were housed in two palaces: La Abadía in Extremadura and the ducal seat in Alba de Tormes. He also cites as important collectors of Italian painting the Mendozas in Guadalajara; the Duque de Villahermosa in Zaragoza; Luis de Ávila, Comendador Mayor of the Order of Alcántara in Plasencia; the de Silvas in Buitrago; the Sandoval y Rojas family in Valencia; the Pimentels (Condes de Benavente); and Antonio Pérez, Secretary to Philip II.<sup>35</sup>

The Berwick y Alba archives – so rich in information about the Carpio and other family collections – ironically contain only fragmentary evidence on the Alba collection in the seventeenth century. However, a number of objects that have either been listed in the surviving inventories or been preserved in the Berwick y Alba art collection are from the sixteenth-century holdings of the “Gran Duque.” These include Titian's St. Martha and Christ and General Pardon Conceded to Flanders by the Duque de Alba, and a curious statue, closely related to sixteenth-century satirical engravings, showing the Duque de Alba crushing a three-headed serpent whose heads represent Queen Elizabeth I of England, the Protestant Elector of Saxony, and the Pope.<sup>36</sup> Alba is also known to have confiscated works by Bosch in Flanders and sent them to Philip II in Madrid.<sup>37</sup> The Pimentel (Benavente) and Infantado collections, discussed below, also began to be prominent at this time.

The investigations of Delaforce and others have thrown considerable light on the collecting activities of the government officials surrounding Philip.<sup>38</sup> Philip II is also known to have bought heavily from the estates of Don Felipe de Guevara, Don Luis Manrique, and Cardinal Gaspar de Quiroga, as well as from the almoneda of Don Juan de Austria, his half-brother,<sup>39</sup> whose names may be added to the list of private collectors at the time.

Art Collecting under Philip III

By the time of Philip II's accession, picture collecting had been identified as an attribute of royalty, and therefore worthy of the king's subjects. The Italianate bias of royal patronage, established under Charles V, continued under Philip II, especially at the Escorial, although a strong Flemish presence was also to be found. The Escorial also seems to have set a standard for interior decoration in which the picture collection played a central, dominant role. What is more, a number of noblemen and other private collectors started to assemble picture galleries of their own. In the reign of Philip III, these still fluid patterns of sixteenth-century connoisseurship coalesced into the forms that came to characterize the great collections of the seventeenth century.

The failures of Philip III as a ruler have unfairly clouded the assessment of his role as a cultural leader, for his reign was not without its artistic and political achievements, as the recent studies of Sarah Schroth, J. Miguel Morán Turina, and Antonio Feros have demonstrated.<sup>40</sup> A number of important examples of the “Court Style” in Spanish architecture date from this period,<sup>41</sup> as do significant attempts at organized urban planning, such as the Plaza Mayor in Madrid and the palace complex at Lerma. Likewise, the era is important for the history of painting in Spain. Not only did the generation of foreign artists who came to work on the Escorial give way at this time to a new group of hispanicized or native-born artists (the younger Carducho, Caxés, Mayno, Orrente, Tristán), but the masters who would soon bring Spanish art to its Golden Age were also maturing. We thus find Philip III’s seal on the apprenticeship contracts of Velázquez, Cano, and Zurbarán.

Nor was Philip III inactive as a collector. Rubens, for example, brought several dozen pictures – gifts of Vincenzo Gonzaga – to Valladolid in 1603.<sup>42</sup> Shortly thereafter, Philip III purchased the collection of Peter Ernest, Graaf Mansfeld, who died in 1604. These chiefly Italian works came to Madrid via Flanders in 1608 and were installed in El Pardo Palace, which Philip III was refurbishing after a disastrous fire.<sup>43</sup> Also in 1608, Philip III ordered a sale of the paintings of Philip II, but he bought in all but a handful of devotional works<sup>44</sup> (the almoneda seems to have been a legal formality taken as an opportunity to refine the collection). Finally, Philip III furnished a complete palace, which was in fact assembled out of houses purchased from his favorite, the Cardenal-Duque de Lerma, in Valladolid. The decoration of this palace, like that of El Pardo, leaned heavily toward Italian – principally Venetian – art.<sup>45</sup> In this, Philip III’s taste foreshadows that of private collectors during his son’s reign.

Lerma, the de facto ruler of Spain from 1599 to about 1618, was a Valencian who had originally held the title of Marqués de Denia. In 1599 he was created Duque de Lerma, a title deriving from a small city near Burgos convenient to the court in Valladolid. Prodigiously converting the king’s favor into material assets, Lerma soon carved out a Castilian empire of land holdings, offices, and royal gifts – the total worth 200,000 ducats (74,800,000 maravedíes) a year by 1602.<sup>46</sup> With this wealth, the king’s privado or válido (favorite) soon became one of the foremost patrons in Spanish history. The ducal palace at Lerma, conceived as part of a planned urban environment,<sup>47</sup> was already a tourist attraction during the duke's lifetime, as shown by the account of Sir Richard Wynn, an Englishman visiting Spain in 1623, who praised the uniformity of the architecture. Wynn was surprised by the relative lack of furniture,<sup>48</sup> but does say that there were pictures in the palace. (Cervera Vera's recent reconstruction of the palace interior, based on seventeenth-century inventories, portray more sumptuous surroundings.)<sup>49</sup>

Lerma was an important picture collector as well; his picture collection, unlike the furniture of his palace, until recently had been little studied: Cervera Vera published only a few pictures among other decorative objects. In a complete inventory of his estate taken at the command of Philip IV, Lerma stated that he had 222 paintings worth a total of 57,018 reales, but this included collections in all three of his seigniorial seats of Lerma, Ventosilla, and Denia.<sup>50</sup> The relatively low valuation of the paintings, as compared to the 80,000 reales' worth of tapestries actually hanging in the palace and many other tapestries and valuables turned over to Carlo Estrada (Carlo Stratta, a Genoese banker) and Diego de Meneses as collateral for large loans, suggests that Lerma was not as interested in picture collecting as he was in decorating his new architectural masterpiece.

The duke, however, collected more actively than the paintings inventoried at Lerma indicate. Earlier in his career, he had donated to the monastery of San Pablo in Valladolid<sup>51</sup> 238 papal portraits and 43 other pictures, including works attributed to Tintoretto, Bassano, and Cambiaso; copies after "Marcello" and Leonardo da Vinci; and unattributed works identified as "Roman" or "made in Italy." To these data might be added Lerma's payments to Bartolomé Carducho in 1603, at least a few of which seem to be for imported paintings, according to the analysis of Angulo and Pérez Sánchez.<sup>52</sup>

Indeed, we now know that the documents previously available have hidden Lerma's activities in the artistic sphere. These have been revealed in stunning detail by the work of Sarah Schroth, just as Lerma's role in the international political life of the age

47. The town complex at Lerma has been studied in great detail by the Spanish architect-scholar L. Cervera Vera. See his El conjunto palacial de la Villa de Lerma, Valencia 1967a; Bienes muebles en el Palacio Ducal de Lerma, Valencia and Madrid 1967b.

48. R. Wynn, Account of the Journey into Spayne (1623), in Hearne's Historia vitae et regni, ..., Oxford 1729, p. 322. Wynn's description of the Lerma complex reads as follows:

"The next Day wee traveled seven Leagues to a town called Lerma, where the Duke (the great favourite of the late King) has a goodly Pallace, built all of stone, and more uniform then Houses in this Country are. Little furniture there was within it, besides pictures, onely the Chappel was richly set forth with ... things that usually adorn such places." Wynn's comments on the sparse furnishings of the Lerma palace might merely betray an Englishman's lack of familiarity with the desornamentado style of Spanish Golden Age interior design, or it might reflect the contemporary custom of moving furniture from one palace to another as the residence of the owner changed. Cf., for example, the account in Sir Robert Bargrave, A Description of my Voyage (1654), Oxford University Bodleian Ms. Rawlinson C. 799, f. 148: "Aranjuez is altogether unfurnished, as indeed are most of ye Kings Palaces, except that in Madrid and ye Retiro; his Custome being to send his Harbingers before him to ye other Palaces, with only such Necessaries as will barely suffice his short Stay." The study of English visitors' accounts of Golden Age Spain has been admirably begun by P. Shaw Fairman, "El Madrid y los madrileños del siglo XVII segun los visitantes ingleses de la epoca," in Anales del Instituto de Estudios Madrileños, 1, 1966, pp. 137–145. has been rehabilitated by Antonio Feros.<sup>53</sup> Schroth published nine new inventories that document the picture collection throughout Lerma's career and indicate his leadership role in the artistic life of the period, not just in Spain but to some extent internationally. Not the least of this influence was directed at the royal collections, since, as Schroth estimates, some 631 of the approximately 700 pictures that Philip III added to the royal collections in fact came from Lerma. At its peak the Lerma collection consisted of about 1,500 pictures, making it one of the largest collections of its time. Certainly larger than any other Spanish collection, it competed at least in size with Italian collections such as those of the Cardinals Pietro Aldobrandini and Francesco Maria del Monte.<sup>54</sup> Any assessment of quality is made difficult by the limitations the Lerma inventories place on our interpretation: for example, only about 25 percent of the entries are attributed, and of these, one-fifth are copies and only about 100 can be traced to extant paintings.<sup>55</sup> Nevertheless, it is clear that the collections contained much of value: three works by Titian, plus 19 copies; original works and copies after Tintoretto and Veronese; an original Correggio; pictures by Bosch and Massys; and numerous works by Spanish masters. Schroth plausibly suggests that the roster of artists indicates Lerma's reliance (and, implicitly, Philip III's as well) on the taste of Philip II, especially in imitation of what the elder Philip had done at the Escorial.<sup>56</sup> This is corroborated by the fact that many of the other collections of the era – for example, the Infantado, Ficallo, and Pozo collections mentioned below – were also begun under Philip II. Thus, with Lerma and his contemporaries we see an early glimpse of what would become a standard aspect of the collecting phenomenon in Golden Age Spain: the close (or symbiotic) relationship between the royal collections and private acquisitions, with the previous royal collections serving as a standard for private collections that would in turn influence royal acquisitions. Lerma's emphasis on Italian, particularly Venetian, and Flemish masters will also prove paradigmatic, although his patronage of Spanish artists would not always be duplicated by other noble collectors.

The impact of the Sandoval y Rojas family upon Spanish private collecting was not limited to Lerma himself. His uncle, Juan de Borja, Conde de Ficallo, possessed more than 200 pictures; another relative, Francisco de Rojas, Marqués de Pozo, owned nearly 300.<sup>57</sup> Schroth's research, as well as the documents presented here, also documents collections for Juan de Acuña, Marqués del Valle (377 pictures), and Pedro Franqueza, Conde de Villalonga (246 pictures).

In 1599 Lerma promoted another uncle, Don Bernardo de Sandoval y Rojas (d. 7 December 1618), to the archbishopric of Toledo. Under Sandoval y Rojas' leadership, the Cathedral of Toledo continued to be a leading source of patronage, and the archbishop himself played a role in the careers of such Toledan artists as Tristán.<sup>58</sup>

58. Pérez Sánchez is currently investigating the role of the Cardinal in art patronage.

Two documents that have come to light in the Madrid archives, the cardinal's will and a later inventory,<sup>59</sup> reveal something of the archbishop's personal collection, which passed in part to the family of his late contador mayor, Don Luis de Oviedo, and was subsequently inventoried during 1663–64 in the estate of Don Luis's son, Don Francisco de Oviedo, who had also been in the Cardinal's service along with his brothers.<sup>60</sup> (Observations on the Ovidos' roles as collectors may be found in the entry for the document.) The Oviedo family apparently purchased or retained only a portion of the archbishop's pictures, because Philip III is also known to have bought several still-life canvases at an almoneda following the prelate's death,<sup>61</sup> but what they acquired seems to have been maintained largely intact from 1618 to the 1660s.

If we therefore assume that the Oviedo inventory is a reliable window into the 1618 Sandoval collection, we find the cardinal active in bringing tenebrist naturalism to Spain. For example, confusion in the documents between Reni and Tristán in the attribution of no. 65 (A Philosopher) suggests that the Reni works owned by the cardinal had been painted in his early, Caravaggesque period. Similarly, the St. Sebastian attributed to Ribera in the documents (no. 15) may be one of the earliest works by this artist to have reached Spain. Ribera had known ties to the Duque de Osuna, Viceroy of Naples under Philip III and Lerma, and was also from Valencia, the original home of the Sandoval y Rojas family. Even more important is the Madonna with Pilgrims, attributed to Caravaggio, no. 1 in the tasación – presumably a copy of the famous Madonna of Loreto that Caravaggio painted for the Church of San Agostino in Rome around 1604. There were also works attributed to Carlo Saraceni and to Spanish painters active in the reign of Philip III, especially those in the first wave of tenebrist naturalism: Luis Tristán and Juan Sánchez Cotán. The court circles were represented by the gentleman-painter and collector, Don Juan de Jaureguí, and by Vicencio Carducho and Eugenio Caxés, who were active as a team at the Toledo cathedral in 1614.<sup>62</sup> Northern art works included pieces by Frans Floris, two copies after Dürer, Flemish landscapes, flower pieces, and still lifes.

The image that emerges from the inventory of the collection presumably owned by the cardinal-archbishop is one of a connoisseur with modern tastes. Sandoval y

60. The 1663–1664 Oviedo inventory has also been published by J. L. Barrio Moya in Revista de Archivos, Bibliotecas, y Museos, 82, 1979, pp. 163–171. Barrio Moya does not comment on the art-historical significance of the collection, nor does he suggest a provenance to the collection of Cardinal Sandoval y Rojas, but he does give a useful summary (most of it from the document) of the biography of Don Francisco de Oviedo. It should also be noted that the Oviedo family was apparently very close to the Cardinal. Not only did all the sons of the Contador hold posts in the Cardinal's household, but the Cardinal also endowed the widow of the Contador with an annuity for life. See AHPM, Prot. 2.310, ff. 1202–1218, partially transcribed in Burke 1984, Doc. 1.5, and the essay with Doc. 73.

61. Madrid: Archivo del Palacio, El Pardo, legajo no. 8, 10 September 1619 – “se le libraron 100 reales a Juan Vanderhamen por pintar un lienzo de frutas y caza para la galería del mediodía ... de El Pardo, en correspondencia de otros que se compraron de la almoneda del Cardenal de Toledo para las sobrepuertas.” (Published by the Marqués del Saltillo in Boletín de la Sociedad Española de Excursiones, 1953, p. 168.) I am indebted to W. B. Jordan for reminding me of this document; see his Juan van der Hamen y Leon, Ph.D. dissertation, New York University Institute of Fine Arts, 1967, pp. 14, 184. (Jordan is now revising his work on van der Hamen, to be published by Yale University Press.)

62. Saltillo 1947b, pp. 608–609. The Cathedral Chapter's role in the importation of Italian tenebrist naturalism into Spain lies just outside the scope of the present study. It is, however, worth noting that in addition to the three canvases now known to be by Saraceni, there is another Italian work cited in the documents of 1614. This is an Assumption of the Virgin of unknown authorship, which is also said to have been “brought from Rome” (Saltillo 1947b, p. 609).

Rojas was clearly in touch with Caravaggesque circles in Rome. He not only owned works by Saraceni but also seems to have possessed one of the earliest direct copies of Caravaggio to have reached Spain. The obvious attempt to include works by earlier Spanish masters that would be compatible with the “modern” pictures in the collection (e.g., works by Navarrete and Blas del Prado) and the presumed patronage of Tristán are logical parallels to the cardinal’s taste in Italian art.

Two other important private collections assembled during the reign of Philip III, those of the Infantados and the Benaventes, are discussed at length in the introductions to the relevant documents, but should be mentioned here as well, along with that of these patrons’ colleague, the Duque de Osuna. The Infantados – archenemies of the Albas in the intrigues and factional struggles of Philip II’s reign and occasionally suspected of direct opposition to the Crown itself<sup>63</sup> – acquired a particularly interesting gallery. In addition to numerous Flemish canvases, the 1601 estate of Don Iñigo López de Mendoza, Duque del Infantado, contained Italian pictures that had been sent to Guadalajara from Rome by Cardinal Mendoza and the Duque de Feria.<sup>64</sup> There were also paintings, presumably Italian, that the late duque had bought in Madrid from “Juan Tiroidino Milanés” – apparently an Italian picture dealer (see the discussion of Carducho’s activities below). The collection was of further significance in that it contained a relatively large number of secular subjects, following the lead of the royal collections under Philip II and anticipated developments in the collections of Philip III and the Duque de Lerma and his circle. As Schroth has pointed out, the presence of still-life compositions and bodegones (still life with figures) in the Infantado, Loaysa Girón, Sandoval y Rojas, Ficallo, Lerma and royal collections is an undeniable indicator of the patrons’ acceptance of still-life compositions as independent works of art.<sup>65</sup> The still lifes also show the collectors’ support of contemporary artistic developments.

Also of great interest is the collection of Don Juan Alfonso de Pimentel, 8th Conde de Benavente, who was Viceroy of Naples from 1603 to 1610. Like the Infantados before him, Don Juan made use of his service in Italy to acquire many fine works of art. Indeed, we may think of him as the first great viceroy-collector of the seventeenth century, and his collection as the prototypical noble collection of the period after that of Lerma. Of particular interest is Don Juan’s patronage of Caravaggio, with whom Don Juan may have been the only Spanish collector to have direct contact. According to Bellori, Benavente brought a Crucifixion of St. Andrew back to Spain at the end of his tenure in Naples: that is, around 1611.<sup>66</sup> This is corroborated by the 1653 inventory of the Benavente collection, which lists such a picture.<sup>67</sup> This work may be identified with a Martyrdom of St. Andrew attributed to Caravaggio, now in the Cleveland Museum.<sup>68</sup> Along with the copy of the Madonna of Loreto in the Oviedo collection, already cited above, and an original half-length David and a Portrait of a Young Man said to have been in the collection of the Conde de Villa

Mediana,<sup>69</sup> Benavente's St. Andrew is among the first documented works by Caravaggio to have reached Spain. Back in Italy Don Juan is known to have been the donor of Caravaggio's Madonna of the Rosary.<sup>70</sup>

Don Pedro Téllez Girón, Duque de Osuna, also made an important contribution to the dissemination of Caravaggism in Spain. It has always been assumed that Osuna, Viceroy of Sicily from 1611 to 1616 and of Naples from 1616 to 1620, brought back a Crucifixion and four other works by Jusepe de Ribera for the Collegiate Church of Osuna. Until as recently as 1991 no documentary evidence specifying dates for this commission had come to light.<sup>71</sup> Study of the matter was greatly complicated by the duque's political disgrace and the events that happened after he returned to Madrid.<sup>72</sup> We now know, however, that the Crucifixion was in fact an Osuna commission – from the duquesa.<sup>73</sup> In addition to providing an important benchmark in the dating of Ribera's oeuvre, the new data provide us with further evidence of the role of collectors in the artistic interchange between Italy and Spain and the involvement of women patrons in Spanish and Italian art of the era.

Non-Noble Collectors under Philip III

Among the non-aristocratic members of Philip III's government involved in picture collecting was Lerma's secretary, Rodrigo Calderón, who maintained a collection and was a patron in his own right.<sup>74</sup> Don Alonso Ramírez de Prado, a member of the Council of Castile arrested for corruption on 20 December 1606, may also have been a collector.<sup>75</sup> Don Alonso's goods were sequestered at the time of his arrest, and the subsequent inventory showed him to have amassed a fortune in real property and personal goods. Contemporary accounts describe an estate containing 41,000 escudos' worth of silverware, 40,000 ducats' worth of jewels, and 94,000 ducats' worth of tapestries and hangings.<sup>76</sup> No paintings are specified in the account, but the Duque de Berwick y Alba, writing in 1924, cited a Diana at her Bath on panel that was said to have entered the Alba collection from that of Ramírez de Prado in 1606.<sup>77</sup> Certainly, later members of the family, such as the Alonso Ramírez de Prado who served on the Councils of Entrambasaguas' figures give Ramírez 904,000 ducats in tapestries and colgaduras. Elliott 1970, p. 318, reads 90,000 escudos, or approximately 94,000 ducats (20 ducats were worth about 19 escudos). The 94,000 ducat sum is undoubtedly correct. Ramírez' total worth exceeded one million ducats, or more money than the Silver Fleet brought to Spain each year in the last decade of Philip III's reign. The figures may have been inflated in the reporting: Cabrera de Córdoba's entry for 1608 suggests that the by then deceased Ramírez left an estate worth only about 220,000 ducats.

One might also note that a later member of the Ramírez de Prado family, Don Lorenzo Ramírez de Prado, also owned pictures. See J. Fayard, Les membres du conseil de Castile a l'époque moderne (1621–1746), Geneva-Paris 1979, p. 464, n. 67, citing AHPM 6.280, f. 407 – document dated 19 May 1657.

Castile and the Indies and died in 1674, had significant collections. The second Don Alonso left more than 200 lots of unfortunately unattributed paintings, some with high valuations (not transcribed here).

Similarly, non-noble officials in the households of prelates and members of the landed aristocracy had an opportunity to develop their own collections on the periphery of their patron's acquisitions. As mentioned above, the death of the cardinal-archbishop Don Bernardo de Sandoval y Rojas of Toledo in 1618 occasioned the transfer of a large segment of his collection to the ownership of his contador, Don Luis de Oviedo. Pérez Pastor's archival investigations have also added a small number of names to the roster of non-noble collectors under Philip III: the courtier-architects Francisco and Juan Gómez de Mora, a Don Juan de Herrera, a Hernando Briviesca and his wife, Doña María de Moscoso, and a Juan de Villela, who may have been an Italian – not to mention the collections of such artists as Leoni, Carducho, García, and Giacomo Trezzo the Younger.<sup>78</sup> To this list we can add the collection of Don Juan de Morales, who died in 1624 but whose pictures seem almost certainly to have been acquired before 1620;<sup>79</sup> those discovered by Schroth;<sup>80</sup> and three collections documented in this publication: those of Francisco de Brizuela y Cárdenas, Agustín de Villanueva, and Gil Ramírez de Arellano.<sup>81</sup>

Philip III's reliance on his favorite, the Duque de Lerma, brought the upper nobility from the peripheral position they occupied under Philip II into a central role in governing the nation. Lerma's patronage system offered sizeable rewards to those who supported the privado. Nobles chosen for service abroad had the additional opportunity to obtain significant works of foreign art; some developed into serious connoisseurs. In short, by the end of Philip III's reign, Spanish society and politics had established conditions favorable to private art collecting.<sup>82</sup>

The royal picture gallery, enriched by treasures from Italy and the Netherlands during the reigns of Charles V and Philip II, continued to grow and to reflect an interest in contemporary European art. Furthermore, Italian artists had established a new school and a succession of new styles in Spain and, most significantly, had begun importing "foreign" works for collectors who were unable to go abroad. Important ecclesiastical commissions, such as those at Toledo, funneled Italian works into Spain. At Valencia and Toledo, as well as at court in Valladolid or Madrid, collectors cultivated a taste for Caravaggesque and other Italian styles of the day, including the reformed manner associated with the Counter-Reformation. The visit of Rubens to Madrid, as well as the continuing obsession of the Spanish court with the political and religious situation in the Low Countries, maintained the traditional artistic connection with Flanders.

Standards of taste regarding older works of art had solidified under Philip III. Although there is not yet enough data to allow us to identify all the artists who were appreciated as "old masters" by 1620, several names appear frequently in the collections, which suggests that they were the artists whose work was highly prized. These of course included Titian and the other Venetians, particularly Bassano, followed by Raphael, Correggio, the reformed Mannerists, the escorialenses, and the early seventeenth-century tenebrists, as well as selected Flemish masters, such as Bosch and the emerging Rubens.

Philip IV as a Collector

In the palace [of the Buen Retiro] we were surprised by the quantity of pictures. I do not know how it is adorned in other seasons, but when we were there we saw more pictures than walls.... I assure you, Sir, that there were more than in all of Paris. I was not at all surprised when they told me that the principal quality of the deceased King was his love of painting, and that no one in the world understood more about it than he.

Jean Muret, 1677<sup>83</sup>

Philip IV was born in 1598 and ascended to the throne in 1621. Trained in drawing by the painter-friar Juan Bautista Mayno, he quickly developed the artistic interests that would so brilliantly characterize the nearly forty-five years of his reign, until his death in 1665. Nevertheless, only now it is possible to begin to give a precise account of Philip IV's collecting.<sup>84</sup> No comprehensive inventory of the royal collections was taken either during Philip's lifetime or at his death. Partial listings were begun in 1636 and 1666, but the Alcázar in Madrid was not completely inventoried until 1686,<sup>85</sup> and the Buen Retiro remained without an inventory until the death of Charles II.<sup>86</sup> Charles II was so inactive as a collector, however, that even the inventories of 1701 offer considerable insight into the decoration of the royal palaces in Philip IV's day.<sup>87</sup> The studies of Pérez Sánchez, Bottineau, Brown, Elliott, Orso, and von Barghahn have augmented this picture considerably, enabling us to have extensive information on Philip's artistic interests.<sup>88</sup>

Philip IV can lay strong claim to being the foremost patron and collector of paintings in his or perhaps any other age. Although his collection would eventually be rivaled (in numbers, not in quality) by the holdings of Don Gaspar de Haro, it was still incredibly vast. At the time of Philip's death there were about 2,600 pictures in only four of the many royal residences, out of a total that may have been as high as 5,500,<sup>89</sup> not to mention hundreds more assembled by royal initiative at the Escorial! Nor were

84. A long step toward an understanding of Philip's relative importance as a collector has been taken by Jonathan Brown, whose 1994 Mellon Lectures at the National Gallery, Washington, on the topic, "Kings and Connoisseurs: Picture Collecting at Four European Courts in the Seventeenth Century," was published in 1995. See also Brown 1987, pp. 4–20.

86. Published in B. von Barghahn, "The Pictorial Decoration of the Buen Retiro Palace and Patronage during the Reign of Philip IV," Ph.D. dissertation, New York University, 1979. An inventory had also been begun in 1664–1666, but, like that of the Alcázar, was left incomplete. The 1701 inventory of the Alcázar was published by the Museo del Prado in 1975 (hereafter: "Alcázar 1701/1975").

87. With the obvious exception of works whose authors were active after the death of Philip IV, we may assume, with von Barghahn and Brown and Elliott (p. 269, note 48), that most of the pictures in the Buen Retiro at the death of Charles II had originally been placed there during the reign of Philip IV.

89. The 1686 inventory lists 1,547 pictures in the Alcázar; von Barghahn 1979 cites another 926 in the Buen Retiro in 1701, although certain of the Retiro pieces were added during the reign of Charles II, yielding approximately 850 for the reign of Philip IV. Brown and Elliott 1980 also cite 171 works at the Torre de la Parada and 96 at the Zarzuela Palace (1980, p. 114). The inventories of 1701 cite 330 works at El Pardo and 150 at the Casa del Campo, but only about 60 at the Torre, indicating about 370 additional works. A handful of works may have remained at Aranjuez, Valladolid, Seville, Granada, Segovia, etc. I thus calculate some 3,000 pictures in Philip's collection. Brown 1987, pp. 17–18, and 1991, p. 204, counts 5,539 pictures in the twelve these riches merely the result of fortuitous inheritance: as Brown and Elliott have pointed out, at least 2,000 of the 2,600 works entered the royal collections during Philip IV's reign, with the total perhaps surpassing 2,500.<sup>90</sup> Furthermore, Philip was an amateur painter who, in spite of the social prejudices of his age, established relationships with Rubens and Velázquez that went far beyond the usual dealings of artists and royal patrons. In this, as in his collecting, he set the pattern for what the British ambassador Hopton called the Spanish "affection" for painting.<sup>91</sup>

The Alcázar Collection

As Philip's principal residence and therefore the seat of government for the various crowns in the Spanish monarchy, the Alcázar in Madrid was necessarily decorated with political and dynastic iconography. But, as Orso has shown, another motive behind the decoration of a room such as the Hall of Mirrors might have been the simple desire to provide a suitable showplace for the king's pictures.<sup>92</sup> In other words, the Alcázar functioned at least in part as a museum of art. For those who wished to emulate the king's love of collecting, the Alcázar would have been the obvious model, and therefore deserves special attention.

The 1686 Alcázar inventory is of interest on several counts. Because it was not taken at the death of a monarch, it was done with a deliberation that might not have been possible in a time of governmental transition. Furthermore, the inventory is prefaced by a summary list of the most important painters represented in the collection. This summary, compiled by the appraiser, Bernabé Ochoa (the jefe de la cerería, or chief chandler of the palace), is an important aesthetic document in its own right. In effect, it summarizes Philip's taste along with his collection. At the same time, however, the summary is far enough removed from Philip and his generation to offer a wider view of seventeenth-century Spanish connoisseurship. The summary tells us, in effect, which European artists late seventeenth-century Spaniards thought significant; it defines a canon of masters whose works were considered benchmarks for the normative aesthetics of the age.<sup>93</sup> Finally, the summary documents Spanish acceptance – even in the minds of bureaucrats, notaries, and accountants – of the Renaissance idea that a painting is not only a precious object but also an expression of the creative personality of a particular artist.<sup>94</sup>

92. Orso 1978, pp. 104–105. The connoisseurship aspects of the decoration of the Alcázar have also been emphasized by Vicente Lleó Cañal in his book review of Orso's text in The Burlington Magazine, 129a, no. 1007, February 1987, pp. 119–120.

93. Panofsky 1968, p. 109, discusses the development of normative aesthetics in the thought of the Seicento Italian critic, Bellori. As I have argued elsewhere, Bellori's normative approach was anticipated in the writings of the Spanish painter and theorist, Francisco Pacheco, who may be said to have affected taste at court through his son-in-law, Velázquez. See "Diego Velázquez and Religious Genre Painting" M.A. thesis, New York University 1973, pp. 24–45; also see Panofsky 1986, p. 217, notes 67–68; p. 219, note 74; and p. 225, note 28. In any case, the list of High Renaissance artists selected by Ochoa for his summary is quite similar to that repeatedly cited by Pacheco when he wishes to call forth the best in earlier art (see, for example, Pacheco 1956, vol. 1, pp. 23 or 475–477).

inventory was executed by masters of the sixteenth-century Venetian school (29 percent of original works; 22 percent of all attributed works); the artist with the greatest number of original works was Titian (78 pictures). Philip had inherited many of these works from his predecessors, Charles V and Philip II, who had commissioned them; others had been acquired by his father and by himself. Many of Titian's pictures had probably assumed an aura of dynastic or political significance along with their aesthetic value, but in any event their prominent role in the decoration of the Alcázar would itself have been sufficient to establish Titian as the Renaissance artist most sought after by Spanish collectors. A strong second place was held by northern European painting of the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. Works of this school constituted 17 percent of the collection (and possibly more, since the inventory does not always distinguish between sixteenth- and later seventeenth-century Flemish painting).

As might be expected, Philip was not very interested in the Central Italian Mannerists (less than 2 percent of all attributed works), although a certain Venetian equivalent can be found in the works of Tintoretto, Bassano, and El Greco (about 80 pieces in all, or 13 percent of the attributed works). Of more importance were the High Renaissance paintings, which were not particularly numerous (about 3 percent of all attributed works) but included some of Philip's most significant acquisitions. There were also a number of works by the highly valued Correggio.

Among pictures by contemporary (seventeenth-century) artists, however, the Flemish school and, above all, the works of Rubens led the way. Indeed, seventeenth-century Flemish paintings seem to have been the single most numerous group in the entire collection (269 pieces, or about 28 percent of all attributed works and 20 percent of those works whose author is specified in the summary, although precise reckoning is again made difficult by the potential confusion between sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Flemish works). In contrast, only about 15 percent of the attributed works in the inventory were of the Italian Seicento (about 5 percent of the attributed works were by the tenebrists, including Ribera; 4–5 percent were of the Bolognese school; and about 6 percent were by other contemporary Italian artists), although the Italian works were distinguished by specific mention of artists' names in the summary.

Most surprisingly, only 13–14 percent of the royal pictures were attributed to Spaniards other than Ribera and El Greco – or about 18 percent, if one includes the two. There were only 28 pictures by Spanish artists other than El Greco active before the reign of Philip IV, and only eight works by El Greco. Indeed, there were only 104 other works by Spaniards, and nearly half of these were by Velázquez (43 works, or about 7 percent of the originals whose authors are specified in the summary). Even if we were to add Ribera to the roster of contemporary Spanish artists – in spite of his Italian career and style – we could count only 142 contemporary Spanish works. On the other hand, the inventory summary also mentions 579 “paintings by unknown hands, among which are many tempera landscapes, descriptions [i.e., city views?], maps, and portraits of great antiquity.”<sup>95</sup> These must have included many Spanish pieces.

In general, Philip IV's collection in the Alcázar displayed a remarkable balance. Slightly less than half of all attributed works had been created before Philip's reign: contemporary works therefore enjoyed a slight majority among the attributed pieces, while older works predominated by a two-to-one margin overall. Looked at without regard to date, attributed Italian and northern European works were almost equal in number (approximately 420 Italian; 438 German, Netherlandish, or Flemish; and 22 unspecified French), with Spanish works a poor third. Among the contemporary works, the Flemish school (269 works?) seems to have outnumbered the Italian and Spanish schools put together (242 works).

The large numbers of Flemish works in the Alcázar may be explained by noting that Flanders, like Naples, was as much a part of Philip's dominions as was Castile. Indeed, given the constant focus of foreign policy on the Low Countries during the reigns of Philip II, Philip III, and Philip IV – not to mention that the so-called “House of Austria” had in fact come to Spain from Flanders – it would have been surprising not to find many Flemish works in the royal palaces. However, among the northern works were many small landscapes (by Bril, for example) and other decorative pieces, which would have had less aesthetic impact than the great Venetian pictures. Furthermore, some 103 of the contemporary Flemish pieces in the Alcázar were either attributed to artists of too little importance to have been mentioned in the 1686 summary or were not attributed at all: that is, we may assume that they were also primarily decorative in function. Of the remaining works, two-thirds were said to be by or after Rubens. In short, Flemish predominance in the Alcázar was to a large extent the result of Philip IV's patronage of Rubens.

What is more, the influence of the Italian school was apparent even within the Flemish segment of the Alcázar collection. Van Dyck, for example, had spent a large portion of his career in Italy, and most of the paintings by Rubens in the Spanish royal collection (including those copied by Mazo and others) were products of his late period, when a renewed interest in Titian, sparked by Rubens' re-encounter with the Spanish royal collection, had augmented the Fleming's own colorism and led him to develop an Italianate sfumato and blond tonality in his works. It might be objected that this is tantamount to saying that Italy had been the fountainhead of all European art since the Renaissance, and Titian one of the sources of the Baroque style, but other, less Italianate Flemings – Jordaens, for example – were not so prominently featured at the Alcázar. (Jordaens is not mentioned in the inventory summary of 1686.) We may also observe that Philip's two favorite Spanish-born painters, Ribera and Velázquez, had both been decisively influenced by the Italian school.

The Buen Retiro

The Alcázar was not the only palace housing Philip IV's collection; nearly as prominent was the Palace of the Buen Retiro. In a sense, the Alcázar and Buen Retiro collections complemented each other. The Alcázar demonstrated Philip's talents as a connoisseur of the great masterpieces of the past; the Buen Retiro displayed his achievements as a patron and collector of contemporary art. But the Buen Retiro's complement of nearly 800 pictures was a group effort involving many of the greatest collectors of the age.<sup>96</sup> As Brown and Elliott have demonstrated, the haste, amid financial restraints, with which the palace was completed made it necessary to draw upon the resources of many people in order to assemble enough works to cover the walls literally from chair-rail to ceiling.<sup>97</sup>

96. See von Barghahn 1979, pp. 71ff., and Brown and Elliott 1980, pp. 105ff.

97. See von Barghahn, passim, and especially, the comments in Brown and Elliott 1980, p. 114, quoting the French cleric, Jean Muret, who visited the Retiro in 1667.

The surviving evidence indicates that, outside the Hall of Realms, which featured the Spanish court artists and Zurbarán, the palace collection was in fact dominated by Italian works. To be sure, there were Flemish pictures in the Retiro, but they seem to have played a much less obvious role in the palace's iconographic programs than at the Alcázar. Many of the Flemish works in the Retiro were unspecified landscapes, still lifes, hunting pieces, or genre scenes: that is, they were purely decorative in purpose.<sup>98</sup> To this we may contrast the series of Roman scenes by Lanfranco and others which were located, according to von Barghahn's reconstruction, in the room that the king crossed just before entering the Hall of Realms. The imperial theme in these works was apparently intended to augment the imperial theme in the Hall of Realms itself.<sup>99</sup>

Noble Collectors and the Royal Collection

While his artistic interests ranged over the whole of Europe, Philip IV himself remained on the Iberian Peninsula, and so had to rely on others – his viceroys in Naples, ambassadors in Rome and London, governors-general in Milan and Flanders – to acquire the works he sought. This process affected Philip's taste, and the taste of the agents themselves, who were often collectors in their own right.

As we discuss later, one nobleman-collector who bridged the regimes of Philip III and Philip IV was Don Fernando Enríquez Afán de Rivera, third Duque de Alcalá de los Gazules (1583–1637).

It is difficult to say whether Alcalá had a direct effect on Philip IV. Certainly, his collecting efforts came just as Philip's own interests were developing, so that it is worth asking whether the display of antiquities and Spanish art at his family's Casa de Pilatos<sup>100</sup> in Seville might not have stimulated Philip's budding interest in collecting and patronage. Although there seems to be no evidence that Philip visited the Casa de Pilatos during his trip to Seville in 1624,<sup>101</sup> he must surely have heard of the collection and of Alcalá's collecting activities in Italy before 1631 – perhaps from Olivares, who intermittently resided in Seville during Alcalá's most active period there. Brown and Kagan suggest that Olivares' awareness of Alcalá's learning may have led to his being chosen as Ambassador to Urban VIII; it is not difficult to imagine Olivares applauding Alcalá's cultural achievements before the young king.<sup>102</sup>

The contributions of four other noblemen to the royal collection are better documented. These are Don Manuel de Azevedo y Zúñiga, 6th Conde de Monterrey; Don Manuel de Moura, Marqués de Castel Rodrigo; Don Ramiro de Guzmán, Duque de Medina de las Torres; and Don Luis de Haro, who would eventually become the 6th Marqués del Carpio. Like their contemporary, the Marqués de Leganés (discussed separately below), all of these men came up in the royal service under the rule of their kinsman the Conde-Duque de Olivares; indeed, Don Luis de Haro became the king's favorite after Olivares' fall from power. Monterrey, Castel Rodrigo, and Medina de las Torres served in Italy, while Luis de Haro manipulated Spain's international network of viceroys, governors, ambassadors, and agents to obtain pictures for the king.

As Olivares' brother-in-law, Monterrey was particularly active in acquiring paintings for Philip IV, especially in the 1630s, when as Viceroy of Naples he was the principal agent for commissioning Neapolitan and Roman works for the Buen Retiro Palace. (This is perhaps what Hopton meant in part when he said that Monterrey had returned to Madrid "with the best of Italye."<sup>103</sup>) Monterrey had also undertaken the transport of two of the most famous works of art to change hands in Seicento Italy: Titian's Andrians and Worship of Venus (Prado, nos. 418 and 419). The pictures, which formerly belonged to Cardinal Aldobrandini, had come into the possession of the Ludovisi family, who were associated with Spain. (For example, Niccolò Ludovisi, the last Italian owner of the pictures, became Viceroy of Aragón.) Monterrey was therefore able either to purchase the pictures outright or (more likely) to serve as the agent responsible for giving them to Philip IV on behalf of the Ludovisi.<sup>104</sup> In any event, the Tuscan Ambassador at Madrid, Bernardo Monanni, in his dispatch of 27 February 1638, assumed that the pictures had belonged to Monterrey, whose "brother" (that is, Olivares) presented them to the king.<sup>105</sup> It was these works by Titian ("particularly the Bacchanalian") that so impressed Hopton.

Pre-eminent among the contemporary works that Monterrey commissioned for the Buen Retiro was a series of scenes from the life of imperial Rome by Lanfranco (Prado, nos. 234–36, 2943, and the Royal Palace of Aranjuez). These works were matched by the large Funeral Games (Exequies) by Domenichino (Prado, no. 2926) and other works with a Roman imperial theme by the younger artists Camassei, Francanzano, Codazzi, Falcone, Andrea de Leone, and Micco Spadaro, as well as by the Roman artists Perrier, Cerquozzi, and Romanelli.<sup>106</sup> According to Monanni, Don Manuel sent twelve cartloads of paintings to the Buen Retiro in the fall of 1633.<sup>107</sup> It is probable that other works for the Retiro came to Madrid later, either in separate shipments or upon Don Manuel's return in 1638.<sup>108</sup> In acquiring contemporary pictures for the king in Naples, Monterrey also made contacts that resulted, as we will see, in acquisitions for his own collection and for the convent of the Agustinas Descal-

104. H. Wethey, The Paintings of Titian, London, vol. 3, 1975, p. 147, assumes that Prince Niccolò Ludovisi was the actual donor of the works, ca. 1637, as they had been inventoried in his possession in a Ludovisi inventory of 1633. If so, Olivares (and Monterrey) seem to have been able to capture completely any public relations value the gesture may have had. (See the following note.)

108. See Brown and Elliott 1980, pp. 123 and 269, note 61, who cite a payment of 31 December 1638 for repairs to "painted pictures which the Conde de Monterrey sent from the Kingdom of Naples." It is not clear whether this payment refers to the shipment of 1633, to works brought back when Monterrey returned in the winter of 1637–1638, to a subsequent shipment also dating from 1638, or to some other envoy. Alba 1924, p. 40, cites a receipt of December 1637 from a Master Lorenzo Penza, for secular and religious statues – the latter intended for Salamanca – sent to Spain in galleons under the charge of a M. Blanquin. The cost of transport was 1,352 ducats. Pérez Sánchez likewise cites a Jesuit letter from the same time which refers to some 8,000 crates of luggage brought back to Madrid from Naples at the cost of 60,000 ducats (1977, p. 419f. – citing Cartas de Jesuitas, in Memorial Histórico Español, 14, p. 346). Note that Don Gaspar de Guzmán, while Viceroy of Naples in the 1680s, used both private merchant ships and Spanish naval vessels to transport works of art back to Spain. Don Gaspar's many shipments were spread out over a long period of time.

zas in Salamanca, which the Monterrey family sponsored. Thus, what the king and Olivares wanted affected what Monterrey collected, while Monterrey specified what was bought and what the artists painted.

Medina de las Torres, who had been married to Olivares' daughter (she died in 1626), followed Monterrey as Viceroy of Naples, 1638–1643. Before leaving Spain, he had given the king three works by the Bassani, inventoried in the Alcázar in 1636.<sup>109</sup> It is commonly assumed that Medina de las Torres commissioned Ribera's Martyrdom of St. Philip for Philip IV in 1639.<sup>110</sup> While viceroy, Medina (not unlike the French Marechal Soult in Spain during the Napoleonic wars) forcibly acquired Raphael's The Madonna of the Fish (Prado no. 297) for Philip.<sup>111</sup> Medina de las Torres is also known to have given an important work by Correggio (Noli me tangere, Prado no. 111) and possibly a work by Giorgione (Madonna with SS. Anthony and Roch, Prado no. 288) to the king in the 1650s for use in the redecoration of the Escorial.<sup>112</sup> His principal contribution to matters of taste, however, would seem to have been his role as a patron of Ribera at the high point of the expatriate artist's career and a means of bringing his works to Spain.

Castel Rodrigo, whose service as Ambassador in Rome overlapped the administrations of Monterrey and Medina de las Torres in Naples, was also instrumental in acquiring works to decorate the Buen Retiro. Indeed, his patronage of the important series of at least 24 Italianate landscapes by Poussin, Claude Lorraine, Dughet, Jan Both, and others has been the subject of scholarly discussion until recently, when documentary evidence and new arguments have appeared to support Castel Rodrigo's role in the commission.<sup>113</sup> We should add that he was an important patron of Borromini as well.<sup>114</sup>

The range of aesthetic values represented by the commissions of each of the nobles was distinct, reflecting in part their different locations in Italy, just as the collections of Leganés and the Conde de Fuensaldaña (see below) were affected by their service in Flanders. But the distinctions also reflect the different artists each had brought into his circle of retainers. In particular, Monterrey, who supported artists

110. Prado 1101; signed and dated 163[illeg. – 0 or 9]. A date of 1630 has been ruled out for this work on stylistic grounds. It was in the Alcázar in 1666. For a review of scholarly speculation on Medina de las Torres as the patron, see E. du G. Trapier, Ribera, New York 1952, p. 149.

111. Provenance cited in Prado 1985, p. 526; cf. Brown 1991, p. 208.

112. According to Padre de los Santos' 1657 description of the Escorial (p. 239; also cited in Prado 1985, p. 166), Medina de las Torres gave the Correggio to Philip IV, who sent it to the Escorial. Prado 1972, p. 243, following a suggestion by A. Morassi, states that the Giorgione, which was at the Escorial by 1657, was similarly a gift of Medina de las Torres.

113. Pérez Sánchez 1977, p. 419, suggests Monterrey's patronage for these works, but the details and dates of his career do not fit into the known circumstances of the commission. M. Röthlisberger (Claude Lorraine, New Haven 1961, pp. 158–159), F. Haskell, Patrons and Painters: Art and Society in Baroque Italy, New York 1971, c. 1963, p. 173, and E. Harris, "G.B. Crescenzi, Velázquez, and the 'Italian' Landscapes for the Buen Retiro," The Burlington Magazine, 122b 1980, passim all suggest G. B. Crescenzi as the patron. Brown and Elliott 1980, pp. 125–129 and 269–270, note 69 reject both this hypothesis and that of Pérez Sánchez, who suggests that Monterrey commissioned the works. Instead, Brown and Elliott, following Von Barghahn 1979, pp. 84ff., advance the more plausible theory that the patron was the Marqués del Castel Rodrigo, who succeeded Monterrey as Ambassador in Rome. They offer further documentary and circumstantial evidence for this hypothesis in "The Marquis of Castel Rodrigo and the landscape paintings in the Buen Retiro," The Burlington Magazine, 129a, no. 1007, February 1987, pp. 104–107.

painting histories and figure subjects in the Bolognese tradition, as well as urban scenes, and Castel Rodrigo, who commissioned pastoral landscapes (also derived from the Carracci, but emphasizing a different set of values), exploited different sections of the contemporary Italian artistic spectrum. Since both groups of artists had obvious ties to the old masters the nobles knew the king admired – particularly Titian and the Venetians, but the Carracci and Reni as well – the commissions honor the king's taste, but the nobles' intervention also added new dimensions to the king's collection, introducing him to aspects of art that he could not previously have known. After receiving Philip's approval, the new pictures became part of the mass of aesthetic information available to other collectors in Madrid by virtue of being located in the royal collection.

Although less concerned with contemporary art, Philip's most important and most intimate collecting relationship was with Don Luis de Haro, who served as Philip's privado from the fall of Olivares in the 1640s to Don Luis's own demise in 1661. An overview of Don Luis's personal collection may be found below and in the entry introducing the Carpio documents, but it will be useful here to describe in some detail his contributions to the royal collection.

The International Trade in Pictures

The wars and other social upheavals that convulsed Europe during Don Luis's lifetime also contributed to a massive redistribution of artistic treasures, which one modern scholar has gone so far as to call "the plunder of the arts in the seventeenth century."<sup>115</sup> In the first place, paintings continued to be diplomatic stock-in-trade, even as they had been in the Renaissance. Thus, Charles I of England, when Prince of Wales, left Spain in 1623 with gifts of Titian's Venus del Pardo and other works.<sup>116</sup> But much more important were the estate sales that followed the political demise or deaths of prominent figures: the sale of the collection of the Cardinal Ferdinando Gonzaga, Duca di Mantova, to Charles I of England in 1627–28;<sup>117</sup> the sales in England of the Arundel, Pembroke, and Buckingham collections, and eventually the royal collection;<sup>118</sup> and the sales in Rome of the collections of important prelates, such as Cardinal Camillo Massimi, whose estate was auctioned in 1677.<sup>119</sup>

Spain's widespread European possessions, not to mention those of the Hapsburg allies, meant that there would be a Spanish viceroy, ambassador, or agent within reach of any important sale. Thus, as we have implied, Leganés, Monterrey, Pastrana, the almirantes, and their contemporaries took advantage of service abroad to enrich either their own galleries or that of the king. By 1645 the king himself had written to Alonso de Cárdenas, the Spanish envoy in London, responding to information about the collections of Charles I and Buckingham that Cárdenas had sent to Madrid.<sup>120</sup> During the next four years Cárdenas continued to keep the king, his Consejo de Estado, and Don Luis de Haro informed of the English sales.<sup>121</sup> (Since Cárdenas was acting on Don Luis's orders, it is difficult to separate those activities benefiting the king from those undertaken only on Don Luis's account.) Similarly, the Conde de Fuensaldaña sent David Teniers the Younger to England in 1651 to purchase paintings at the Pembroke and presumably other sales.<sup>122</sup> Teniers – somewhat against the wishes of Cárdenas, as the testy language in his report to Don Luis suggests – left 44 of these paintings for Cárdenas to send back to Spain.<sup>123</sup>

Other noblemen also made use of agents to buy art, but none of these collectors could claim the resources and access to Spanish diplomatic channels that Don Luis de Haro possessed as the privado of Philip IV. As Brown has described it, Haro was a major beneficiary of the massive dispersal of pictures following the English Civil War.<sup>124</sup> It is remarkable how specific Don Luis's instructions were, for example, on what kind of subjects were to be bought and how concerned he was that Cárdenas understand the reactions of Velázquez and the other connoisseurs at the Spanish court. Cárdenas, for his part, responded with determination, sound connoisseurship, shrewd bargaining, and an occasional display of humor. He was willing to pursue a Holy Family by Raphael for the better part of a year – perhaps even for four years. He carefully kept Don Luis apprised of any paintings for sale.<sup>125</sup> He often waited until the price was right and almost always bought at considerably below the estimate.<sup>126</sup> He knew whom to bribe and when to do it,<sup>127</sup> and he was well aware of the subjective nature of the art market.<sup>128</sup> If, as the documents suggest, he went to Holland to buy pictures, then his pursuit of art took him considerably beyond the usual boundaries of Spanish culture.

Don Luis was also aware of what other nobles were doing, including the work of Teniers the Younger for Fuensaldaña. Fuensaldaña would, of course, give many of the better pieces to Philip IV, but Teniers' haste also gave Don Luis de Haro an opportunity to look over Fuensaldaña's purchases. A number of the Fuensaldaña works had also been sought by Don Luis; 21 of them would eventually enter the Carpio collection, including a Bassano Nativity and an Annunciation to the Shepherds, a Palma Vecchio Holy Family, Titian's Adoration of the Magi (possibly now in the Prado), a portrait and a Madonna by Andrea del Sarto, six portraits by Tintoretto, two works by

Similarly, Cárdenas was not Don Luis's only correspondent. In 1653 Don Luis exchanged letters with the Marqués de la Fuente in Venice, with regard to the acquisition of a version of Tintoretto's Gloria, which Velázquez had admired.<sup>130</sup> In 1657, Don Luis wrote to the Duque de Terranova in Rome about the purchase of statues for Philip IV.<sup>131</sup> In 1661, the Conde de Ayala, writing from Italy, asked Don Luis to pay for Raphael's Christ on the Way to Calvary "Spasimo di Sicilia", Prado (298), Madrid which the Spanish king had been seeking to obtain.<sup>132</sup>

The list of works that Don Luis acquired either with the intention of giving them to Philip or acting on Philip's instructions is simply stunning. First place is held by Raphael's Christ Carrying the Cross. In addition there were the treasures acquired to redecorate the Escorial, to be discussed below, including works by Titian, Veronese, and Palma Giovane. Among other Venetian works given to the king were two small pictures by Mantegna, one of which, a Death of the Virgin, is also in the Prado (no. 248), (Fig. 18), as well as Tintoretto's Rape of Helen,<sup>133</sup> Titian's Twelve Emperors,<sup>134</sup> and Veronese's pair of Hercules and Virtue and Vice, the latter being the Youth between Virtue and Vice now in the Prado (no. 499), (Fig. 19). There was also a self-portrait (Fig. 20) and a so-called Portrait of the Artist's Father, both attributed to Dürer and now in the Prado (nos. 2.179 and 2.180). A Madonna by Parmigianino<sup>135</sup> and Ribera's Tantalus may also have been given to the king at this time.<sup>136</sup>

Many of the best works Don Luis purchased for the king were, however, destined for the Escorial. After the Alcázar and Buen Retiro collections, the monastery of San Haro dimensions of  $2\frac{1}{4} \times 3$  varas = 1.96 x 2.52 m.). Two Turkish Battles by Tintoretto appear in the Gonzaga collection in Mantua in 1607; Prado 1972 suggests that no. 399 was one of these and was acquired by Velázquez in Venice. The Prado entitles the work An Episode from a Battle between Turks and Christians, but C. Bernari and P. For a complete discussion of possible identification of the Tantalus – as tortured as the subject itself – see Burke 1984, vol. 1, notes to Chapter 3, p. 312, note 57. To summarize, A. Palomino de Castro y Velasco, El museo pictórico y escala óptica, Madrid [1724] 1947, p. 877 speaks of a set of four torturati (Titius, Ixion, Tantalus, and Sisyphus) by Ribera and says that one of these – the Ixion – had been in the house of Jacob Uffel in Amsterdam but was taken back to Italy, reunited with the other three pictures, and eventually brought to Spain. The Titius and Ixion are now in the Prado, nos. 1113 and 1114 (both 2.27 x 3.01 m.), and the Tantalus and Sisyphus are lost. Palomino may have been confused about the title of the piece in Amsterdam; I find it much more reasonable to suppose that it was the Tantalus purchased by Cárdenas, possibly in Holland. See also the four tormentos inventoried in a middle-class collection, as noted in AHPM, Prot. 6.297, f. 776v.

Lorenzo del Escorial represented the most important repository of art within the royal domain. In the years following the death of Balthasar Carlos in 1645, the king had turned his attention to the Escorial and its Royal Pantheon, which was completed by March 1654. Subsequently, the project came to include the decoration of the sacristy, an ante-sacristy, and the salas capitulares (especially, the prior's and vicar's chapter room) and would therefore have required devotional paintings.<sup>137</sup> This explains in part Philip's particular interest in the pictures being sold in England in the wake of the Civil Wars, 1645–50, and it also explains Palomino's assertion that Velázquez, who was in charge of the redecorations, assembled the needed paintings from the almoneda of Charles I of England as well as from his own purchases in Italy and from pieces provided by the Conde de Castrillo,<sup>138</sup> although we now know that it was actually Don Luis de Haro, through Alonso de Cárdenas, was the actual purchaser of the English pictures.<sup>139</sup>

Philip indicated in 1656 that he had formed, “for some time, the intention to adorn [the sacristy of the Escorial] with the most beautiful pictures that could be obtained, given that his remains were going to rest here for all time.”<sup>140</sup> Several years earlier Don Luis had also expressed concern about the pictorial decoration of the palace, but his concern was motivated more by what we would today call public relations rather than religious piety:

Although there are some very great things by Titian at the Escorial, there are a lot of other paintings that are very bad, unworthy of being in that place among the other pictures; and since that place is a theater where so many foreigners continually stop by at all times of the year, and they admire it as such a great marvel, I wouldn't mind if all the bad were to be taken away and replaced, if not by first class masters, then at least by [better] ones ...<sup>141</sup>

It is worth noting that Philip and Don Luis had become so identified with the issues of dynastic tradition and the status of the monarchy that they both assume that fine pictures are not only desirable but also necessary. Don Luis's comments also imply a relatively high level of public access (if only by the wealthiest members of society) and suggests that the foreign, “tourist” presence in Golden Age Spain was substantial, perhaps much larger than is commonly assumed.

Some of Philip IV’s gifts to the Escorial are recorded in the 1657 edition of Padre Santos’ Breve descripción, which was written in part to celebrate the king’s completion of the Royal Pantheon and concurrent redecoration of the Escorial sacristy and other areas.<sup>142</sup> (The decoration of the chapter rooms was not finished until after 1657, so we must rely on later editions and other sources to recreate the decoration schemes.) Padre Santos’ account corroborates the Alcázar inventory of 1686, which mentions 41 works sent to the Escorial by Philip IV in 1656, along with 20 more sent by Charles II in 1675.<sup>143</sup> Santos’ descriptions often include works that Haro acquired from English collections.

The initial decoration of the Escorial had, of course, been entrusted to Italians and Italian-trained Spaniards such as Navarrete, and the collection there included some of the best examples of Titian’s art in Spain.<sup>144</sup> The works still remaining at the Escorial today (or conserved in the Prado with provenance to the Escorial) suggest that Philip IV maintained this highly Italianate decorative scheme, especially in the sacristy, although it also had two pictures by Van Dyck and the chapter rooms had works by Rubens, Daniel Seghers, and Van Dyck (at least one picture by the latter from a Milanese collection, and therefore presumably from his Italian period).

Among the pictures Don Luis bought for the sacristy were Raphael’s Madonna della Perla (Prado, no. 301, probably painted with Giulio Romano) (Fig. 11), possibly his Madonna della Tenda (now in the Alte Pinakothek, Munich, H.G. 797) (Fig. 21),<sup>145</sup> Andrea del Sarto’s Madonna and Child with an Angel and St. John the Evangelist (Madonna della Scala) (Prado, no. 334) (Fig. 22), and Tintoretto’s Lavatorio (Prado, no. 2824). For the prior’s chapter room, Don Luis provided a Conversion of St. Paul and a matching Triumph of David by Palma Giovane (Prado nos. 272 and 271) (Figs. 24 and 25), as well as Veronese’s Christ and the Centurion (Prado, no. 492) (Fig. 26), which Antonio Ponz called “the finest Venetian painting in the Escorial.”<sup>146</sup>

In their efforts to redecorate the Escorial, Philip IV and Don Luis had enlisted several other members of the aristocracy, just as Olivares had done twenty years earlier in decorating the Buen Retiro. Thus, as noted elsewhere, the Conde de Benavente, the Duque de Medina de las Torres, and the Marqués de Leganés all contributed pictures, and a number of others were bought from the estate of the Almirante de Castilla in 1647. In the 1660s, after Velázquez was already dead, a number of works from the Serra Collection in Genoa were acquired by the Conde de Peñaranda and used in the vicar's chapter room.

We have already seen how Monterrey and Castelrodrigo, by providing Philip with specific objects compatible with his tastes, could embellish the king's collection. But they and the other viceroys of Naples had the advantage of being in Italy, where the latest developments were taking place. (The same applies to Leganés and other Spanish connoisseurs in Flanders.) Don Luis was bound to Madrid, and he was, moreover, a particularly busy man with things other than pictures on his mind.

In any case Don Luis seems to have been willing to depend on the expertise of Velázquez, Angelo Nardi, and the other artists and connoisseurs at court.<sup>147</sup> His letters to Cárdenas often contain references to hoped-for approval from the experts:

Velázquez has seen the Raphael, and it seemed to him a very great thing, as I hope will be the case with the others.<sup>148</sup>

The other one which I have given to H.M. these days is the large Lavatorio by Tintoretto, and Velázquez as well as Nardi have not only taken it to be a great original but also ... [letter fragmentary].<sup>149</sup>

Indeed, two of Don Luis's intended gifts ran afoul of the expertise of Velázquez and Nardi. The Portrait of Leo X with Cardinals Giulio de' Medici and Luigi dei Rossi attributed to Raphael was held to be the copy by Andrea del Sarto mentioned by Vasari,<sup>150</sup> and the attribution of Correggio's Mercury, Venus, and Cupid was rejected – unjustly, as it now appears.<sup>151</sup> Don Luis kept both works for his own collection.

All of this suggests that we must not assume Don Luis was simply carrying out orders from Philip. In the case of the Spasimo de Sicilia, as Brown has noted,<sup>152</sup> the immense price of the picture and the necessity to establish a perpetual grant to the monastery that owned it, not to mention Philip's long-standing interest in the work, does indicate that Don Luis was receiving instructions from the king. Similarly, Brown describes Don Luis's purchases from the collection of Charles I of England via Cárdenas as a ruse to disguise the king's involvement (which would have been indiscreet, considering the fact that Charles had been executed by Parliament).<sup>153</sup> Even in its fragmentary state, however, the Haro-Cárdenas correspondence reveals Don Luis to be exercising independent judgment: he clearly knew what would please Philip IV, and he passed this information on repeatedly to Cárdenas, but his choice of words suggests that many of the decisions were his own.<sup>154</sup>

Don Luis and Philip IV were the same age, were both members of the same closed society, and had both matured under the shadow of Olivares. In a sense they were more closely related emotionally than brothers could ever be. Don Luis's son, speaking through the anonymous writer of his "authorized" biography, would later claim that Don Luis "agreed in every way with the disposition of the king" and remained Philip's privado because of "the uniformity of their characters."<sup>155</sup> On this point we have Philip's own testimony. Writing to Sor María de Agreda, his confidant and advisor during the troubled later years of his reign, Philip explained his reliance on Don Luis thus:

And although it is true that I have trusted him above my other retainers, it has been because he was brought up with me from childhood, and I have never recognized any ugly thing in him, neither in his habits nor in the things he has represented to me, for he has always lived moderately, and I take him to be a person of good intentions. And even though [all] this is true, I have always refused to style him my "minister," so that the unto-ward recent events [i.e., Olivares' later years] might be avoided.<sup>156</sup>

The same quality that kept Don Luis in power – his ability to be of the same mind as the king – also informed his contributions to the royal picture collection. It was not so much a question of interaction as identity.

With regard to the Escorial decoration, Don Luis's purchases for Philip IV had a second, more practical aspect to them. The Escorial project assumed for Don Luis something of the importance that the Buen Retiro had had for Olivares – we have already noted his concern for the public relations aspects of the monument. As the king's privado, Don Luis had an implicit responsibility to see the work completed in the best possible way, and he therefore tried to obtain the best "big name" artists: Raphael, Titian, Correggio. Unlike Olivares, however, Don Luis had to share his authority with Velázquez, who held an important court office and who was also firmly entrenched in the king's favor.<sup>157</sup> This is why Don Luis was so concerned that Velázquez approve Cárdenas' purchases; he was also following the long-standing Hapsburg tradition of using art for political ends, including his own career.

Don Luis was not, however, insensitive to the other qualities of the pictures he was collecting. For example, when doubts about the Raphael Cardinals and Correggio's Mercury led to their disattribution, Don Luis wrote to Cárdenas,

But your Honor ought to temper this disappointment with the fact that, if these pictures are not found suitable for the king's quarters, they nevertheless will be hung in mine, with the good faith in which they ought to be held and in which the painters over there hold them ... 17 December 1654.<sup>158</sup>

A month later, Don Luis returns to this theme:

but this displeasure ... has two recompenses ... That with these two pictures ... I will remain, and I will consider them to be originals ... [letter fragmentary; 22 January 1655].<sup>159</sup>

He goes on to tell Cárdenas that the Venus by Reni had found approval:

And [my] not having written to your Honor about it was not because it had not been so esteemed, but rather that this master is not of the same level as the others.

Evidently Don Luis's artistic values allowed him to rank Reni below Tintoretto and Raphael, although it must be added that he kept the Reni, lesser master or not, for his own collection.

The Serra Collection

The purchases of works from foreign collections by Fuensaldaña, Haro, and the king suggest that in Madrid the acquisition of works of art did not occur in a vacuum but was rather part of an international, European phenomenon, in which the tastes of collectors in one country could influence decisions in others, especially when groups of pictures moved from one collection to another.

One more "international" collection ought to be mentioned briefly. Among the Haro-Cárdenas documents of 1654 in the Palacio de Liria is an inventory or list that covers some 44 paintings in the collection of a "Marqués Serra": that is, the Marchese Giovanni Francesco Serra di Cassano, a Genoese general who had fought for Spain.<sup>160</sup> This collection was apparently well known in its time; in addition to the Haro list it is also catalogued in seventeenth-century Italian inventories preserved in Mantua and Modena, first published by G. Campori in 1870.<sup>161</sup> The collection was seen before 1657 in Milan by F. de Scanelli,<sup>162</sup> and also by the young Oratorian priest Sebastiano Resta, who later recalled the visit in the following way:

In Milan I have seen a most beautiful large picture by his hand in the gallery of the Marchese Francesco Serra of Genoa, Field Marshall General in Italy of His Catholic Majesty, Philip IV, along with a Venus by Titian and another made by Annibale Carracci in the good manner [buon gusto] of Correggio, and other pictures from the aforesaid gallery, which, in the year just passed of 1664 were bought for 5,000 [doubloons?] by the Conde de Peñaranda, Viceroy of Naples, and sent to His Majesty in Spain.<sup>163</sup>

The works, principally north Italian as we would expect, had been assembled with refined connoisseurship: for example, as both Serra and Campori's anonymous

161. G. Campori, Raccolta di cataloghi ed inventarii inediti, Modena 1870, pp. 453–455; Campori cites nearly identical entries. Compare, for example, his description of a Venus and Adonis with that of the Alba/Carpio Serra list, item 39: (Campori 1870, p. 455) "famosa Venere con Adone e Cupido di mano d' Anibal Carraccio, fatta da lui ad emulazione di quella di Tiziano" (No. 39) "la famosa Venus con Adon y Cupido de mano de Anibal Caracio, hecha de el a emulacion de la que hizo el Tician." As I indicated in 1984, we may therefore assume that the inventory in Campori describes the collection of the Marchese Serra. Vannugli 1989 independently came to the same conclusion, using Campori's document to reconstruct the collection and compare it to the Spanish Alcázar inventory of 1666/86. See also D. In 1664, as Resta indicates, the outgoing Spanish Viceroy of Naples, Gaspar de Bracamonte y Guzmán, Conde de Peñaranda, an important statesman and a collector in his own right, purchased at least part of the Serra collection for Philip IV. Apparently, 39 paintings from the collection were bought for Madrid. A number of these may be identified with extant works in the Prado, Academia de San Fernando, or the Escorial. These include Carracci's Venus and Adonis already mentioned (Serra no. 39, Prado no. 2631), Parmigianino's Portrait of One of the Counts of San Secundo (no. 13, Prado no. 279), Lorenzo Lotto's Messer Marsilio and his Wife (no. 10, Prado no. 240 Fig. 23), Reni's Atalanta and Hippomenes (no. 3, Prado no. 3090), and Reni's Christ with the Cross (no. 38).<sup>164</sup> Among the works sent to decorate the vicar's chapter room in the Escorial were Esther before Ahasuerus attributed to Tintoretto (no. 8)<sup>165</sup> and Vincenzo Catena's Christ Giving the Keys to St. Peter (no. 15, attributed to Bellini, Prado 20). One of Van Dyck's versions of Santa Rosolea (no. 8; Prado no. 1494?),<sup>166</sup> a St. Jerome by Campi (no. 5, Prado 59), Bassano's Expulsion of the Moneylenders (no. 23), and a copy after Leonardo (no. 19) may have gone to the Escorial, but the provenances are confused with those of similar works in the collection of the almirante, Medina de las Torres, the royal collection, and the Escorial itself. With regard to other collections in Madrid, there is the possibility that the Apollo Flaying Marsyas by Ribera, no. 1 in the Serra inventory, can be identified with a work of the same title in the Carpio collection in 1689.<sup>167</sup>

The Noble Collectors

As we have already indicated in our summary of the age of Philip III and Lerma, almost all the great noble collectors shared certain resources and political or social experiences that allowed them to amass the cultural treasures that are the subject of this study. Let us therefore pause before surveying the collections of the reign of Philip IV to examine the qualities they had in common.

The first of these was proximity to the king and the royal collection, the latter for its influence on the collector's developing taste and the former for the financial and travel opportunities that royal favor could provide. Often, proximity to the king meant being part of the circle of the favorite then in power: Lerma's friends and relatives, in the case of Philip III, or the Castrillo-Olivares-Carpio group (the Guzmán and Haro families) under Philip IV.

Second, to be a successful, the collector (and patron) usually needed to serve abroad, either in Flanders or in Italy, as Ambassador, Governor-General, or Viceroy. In fact, every one of the great collecting families had at least one member who served in a high position in Italy. However, almost every one of the Spanish collectors active in Italy had to some extent formed his or her own tastes before leaving Spain, so that the relationship between Spanish and Italian artistic values was by no means one-sided. At the same time, the collectors who remained behind in Spain, including the king and many members of the monied non-noble group (which we have somewhat anachronistically identified as a “middle class”), could count on a steady supply of works from Italy and Flanders coming back to Spain. Eventually, and surprisingly quickly in some instances, many of these works circulated in a type of art market by means of almonedas.

Given the massive debts of the Spanish grandees, one may wonder how the great noble collectors found the means to acquire their collections. Would-be collectors in Golden Age Spain could tap a variety of sources for the income they needed. Even when their estates were burdened with debt, the grandees’ annual flow of rents generated liquid assets that could be diverted to purchases. In addition, royal favor occasionally resulted in direct grants of money or legal assistance against creditors.<sup>168</sup> Royal favor could also lead to the grant of a title with income-producing lands attached, such as those given to Lerma, Olivares, Medina de las Torres, and many other collectors cited here. Moreover, participation in the government could result in control over such income-producing entities as the Chancery of the Indies and the rental properties of the military orders. Thus, even the heavily mortgaged Infantado estates nevertheless provided an annual flux of approximately 100,000 ducats, or 1,100,000 reales. The buying power of such a sum may be better understood in the light of mid-seventeenth-century wages: Infantado brought in 3,000 silver reales a day (Sundays included), while a worker in the 1620s and 1630s earned between one and five reales each day he worked at what we would today consider unskilled to semiskilled labor. That is, Infantado’s cash flow was 600 to 3,000 times greater than the wages of an ordinary person. Although we lack a precise modern equivalent, it would nonetheless be in the millions of dollars a year. Lerma’s relatively unencumbered estates yielded twice this amount.

The Thirty Years’ War gave the nobility yet other opportunities for personal enrichment, which they were quick to exploit.<sup>169</sup> The vast expenditures necessary to maintain Spain’s newly aggressive foreign policy directed a stream of income from the silver mines of Potosí and the millones tax in Castile out to the captain-generalcies of Spain’s European network. Furthermore, Spaniards in foreign service received salaries or reimbursements for expenses and, depending on their status, might also find ways to skim local tax receipts.

One example of the large sums involved may be cited. The Marqués de Leganés, who had received his title and its income as a royal grant, also held a series of military positions in Flanders and Italy, as well as the governorship of Milan, for all of which he would theoretically have drawn salaries. More importantly, as governor he would have been allowed to tap the resources of Spain’s military and political establishments in northern Italy. In 1640, Leganés suffered a military defeat at the hands of the French, losing, along with the battle, some 50,000 escudos (59,000 ducats) in cash, representing buying power somewhere between 3 million and 20 million dollars today. Although it is not clear whether the money was his own or actually the Crown’s (he may have financed the campaign out of his own pocket in the expectation of reimbursement), Leganés’ contemporaries understood the sum to have been relatively modest compared to his total wealth.<sup>170</sup>

169. Trevor-Roper (in the New Cambridge Modern History, vol. 4, 1971, pp. 278–281) and others have suggested that it was the international Spanish bureaucracy – or perhaps directorate, since we are dealing with such high-born nobles as the Duque de Osuna, the Marqueses de Bedmar and Villafranca, and the Conde de Fuentes – who actually fomented the change from the pacifistic stance of the Lerma regime to the more bellicose posture of Olivares and Philip IV. (See also Elliott 1968, pp. 325–327.)

170. López Navio 1962, p. 264.

Leganés was, of course, one of the foremost collectors of the age; among the spoils taken by the French at Milan were also a number of his paintings. Men who dealt at this level of finance (and in cash at that) had little difficulty finding a few hundred ducats for a choice work by Annibale Carracci, or even a few thousand for a canvas by Raphael or Correggio, especially since they were already in Italy or Flanders, where they held the reins of power. Furthermore, it was difficult for the government in Madrid to supervise the foreign officials – all the more so if the privado depended on their support to maintain his own power. Thus, as Brown and Elliott have remarked, a Viceroy of Naples like the Conde de Monterrey could, in effect, bleed the kingdom dry for the dual goals of Spanish arms and personal greed.<sup>171</sup>

Entailments

An incident in Florentine-Spanish international relations during the reign of Philip IV not only illustrates the importance of art collecting in official policy at the time but also points to the close interrelationship between the king's taste and attitudes and those of the grandees. Recent research by Edward I. Goldberg has revealed a series of letters between the Grand Duke of Florence and his ambassador in Madrid, concerning the proper gift to offer Don Luis de Haro in thanks for having negotiated the sale of a fortress town to the Grand Duchy of Tuscany. After much wrangling, the Grand Duke finally sends a sculpted equestrian portrait of Philip IV. The Ambassador gives the piece to Don Luis, who immediately gives it in turn to the king:

This morning, Don Luigi went to present [the statue] to the King. His Majesty was gratified in the extreme, and he personally showed it to all the courtiers, who agreed that the statue and buffet are without equal in the world. His Majesty had it placed in the Octagonal Room between the two galleries; the walls of this room are decorated with pilasters and niches of jasper and with beautiful statues, and it is here that the king keeps his most precious things, as the Grand Duke does in his Tribuna [that is, in the Gallery of the Uffizi].

In the King's presence, Her Majesty the Queen and the Infanta both made their case: the Queen claiming it for her first male child and the Infanta saying that she would take it with her when she leaves to marry. The King laughed, telling them both that they had figured it wrong; since the horse and the table were placed in this Tribuna, it no longer belonged to him. Anything that enters that room is understood to be made over to the Crown.<sup>172</sup>

Two aspects of this report should be noted: first, Luis de Haro's having given the horse to the king – typical of his self-effacing ability to please the monarch – and second, Philip IV's attitude toward the works of art in the Octagonal Room. Given the presence of dynastic portraits by Titian in the Octagonal Room, Philip's response is characteristic of the Spanish Hapsburg rulers from at least Philip II on. In Hapsburg Spain works of art held a special significance for the king and, indeed, for the Crown.

Goldberg has properly connected this incident with the grandees' attempts to entail their art collections. During the seventeenth century, a number of noble collectors sought to make their collections a permanent part of their estates, in the way that certain royal pictures were apparently understood, in Philip's words, to be "made over" to the Crown. Accordingly, the best parts of the Benavente, Carpio, and Leganés collections were entailed in an attempt to prevent their dispersal. Thanks to the efforts of López Navio and Mary Crawford Volk, we have extensive information on Leganés' attempt to incorporate (vincular) his art collection into the mayorazgo of the marquise of Leganés – that is, into the estates pertaining to and inalienable from his noble titles.<sup>173</sup>

The word mayorazgo, related to hijo mayor, means, literally, "primogeniture" or "an estate inherited by primogeniture." It may be translated very loosely as "an entailment" or "an entailed estate": an estate whose property may be inherited only by a specified line of heirs in such a way that the property can never be transferred legally. As Volk points out, a specified succession was part of Leganés' motivation for authorizing the escrituras de mayorazgo that detailed his estates in 1630 and 1642.<sup>174</sup> (An obsession with the inheritance of his estate also marked Olivares' final years: his will reflects a desperate attempt to specify his legal heirs.)<sup>175</sup> What is more, one of the documents presented in this volume contains evidence that "courtier class" (non-noble propertied subjects) collectors were also seeking to entail paintings for inheritance by the eldest surviving child through the legal device of a patronazgo (as opposed to a mayorazgo).<sup>176</sup>

In an age when feudal rights were fast becoming obsolete, and when income was likely to be mortgaged heavily, the ability to catalogue the precise real property, fixtures, and movable goods adhering to a given title – and to protect this property from alienation via an almost inevitable almoneda – was an important, even necessary device for keeping a great estate together. However, as far as this study has been able to determine, seventeenth-century nobles who sought to found mayorazgos were more often successful at specifying what was to be inherited than they were at determining who could inherit it. The history of the estates of Olivares, Infantado, Pastrana, Carpio, Benavente, and (in the eighteenth century) Alba suggests that the Spanish courts tended to uphold the rules of genealogical succession and the exigencies of particular legal situations rather than the wishes of the founders of noble houses.<sup>177</sup> Furthermore, below. The legal history of Spanish entailments remains unclear; until the appearance of this document, many scholars had assumed that entailments (in the sense of mayorazgos) were the privilege of the nobility. Perhaps the creation of a patronazgo, with analogy to the foundations established for convents, hospitals, and the like, was a legal experiment, an attempt to get around social restrictions. The matter clearly warrants further study.

173. López Navio 1962, p. 261. Volk 1980, p. 257, notes that the ability of Leganés to incorporate his paintings into his entailed estate was dependent upon his status as a grandee, which was accorded him along with his marquise in 1627. See also AHNM, Sección Osuna, legajos 440/2-29, 440/2-33.

“primogeniture” in Spain could mean succession by the eldest daughter in the absence of a male heir. As a consequence, surviving daughters could, and often did, inherit noble titles and their estates. When these daughters married, their titles and estates could be “captured” by other noble families. (Thus, the Carpio, Monterrey, and Olivares collections all came to be part of the Alba estates, and the houses of Infantado and Pastrana were merged.)

As a result of this complex legal situation, very few galleries survived in the form that their founders envisioned. But the grandees’ success or lack of it is not the real issue: what is important is their intent. Spanish noblemen and noblewomen – particularly those in the circle of Olivares – thought enough of their art collections to want to incorporate them into their very titles, to be passed down to future generations along with their lands, castles, palaces, and aristocratic status. With the new evidence provided by the Florentine Ambassador, we may also understand the noble entailments in relation to the Hapsburg attitude toward works of art: like their rulers, the nobles came to understand ownership of works of art as an important aspect of the ruling family’s traditions.

The Alcalá Collection

The first collector we will discuss is Don Fernando Enríquez Afán de Rivera, the third Duque de Alcalá de los Gazules, whose career spans the transition from Philip III and Lerma to Philip IV and Olivares. His collection has been published elsewhere<sup>178</sup> but is worth reviewing here at some length because it may be taken as a paradigm for the noble collections of the following reign.

The Duques de Alcalá, Marqueses de Tarifa (family name Afán de Rivera) were Spanish collectors and patrons of art, architecture, archaeology, and literature. Their palace at Seville, the Casa de Pilatos,<sup>179</sup> was begun at the end of the fifteenth century and completed in the 1530s by Don Fadrique Enríquez de Rivera, the first Marqués de Tarifa. Don Fadrique’s nephew and heir, Don Per Afán de Rivera, first Duque de Alcalá de los Gazules, subsequently assembled a large collection of antiquities around a group of marbles given to him by the Pope Pius V, whose papacy coincided with Don Per Afán’s tenure as Ambassador to Rome and Viceroy of Italy, 1566–1572.

The third duque, Don Fernando, was born in Seville in 1583; he served as Viceroy of Catalonia from 1618 to 1622, Ambassador to Rome from 1625 to 1629, Viceroy of Naples from 1629 to 1631, and Viceroy of Sicily from 1632 to 1636. A member of Francisco Pacheco's "academy" of artists, writers, and intellectuals, Alcalá was a leading patron of the arts and letters in his native Seville during the reign of Philip III and a supporter of Rodrigo Caro, the father of Spanish archaeology. He was also the possessor of a remarkable collection of antiquities housed in the Casa de Pilatos. The Alcalá library, an important resource for the Sevillian literati, was decorated by Pacheco in 1604 with a complicated allegory of intellectual virtues symbolized by scenes from the ancient myths.<sup>180</sup> Pacheco's Arte de la pintura is laced with references to the duke's own love of collecting, not to mention his efforts as an amateur painter.<sup>181</sup> A measure of Alcalá's sympathy with his intellectual companions in Seville may be gathered from his correspondence with Pacheco about ancient art in Rome after his appointment as Ambassador there.<sup>182</sup>

By the time Alcalá arrived in Rome as Philip IV's Extraordinary Ambassador to Pope Urban VIII in 1625,<sup>183</sup> he had already become a discerning connoisseur of painting. In addition to collecting pictures, Alcalá continued to develop his interest in antiquities, as may be seen in the letters to Pacheco already cited above, to which may be added the evidence of the many marbles and ancient medals in his possession in Genoa at the time of his death in 1637. According to Pacheco, Alcalá also took the young Madrid painter, Diego Cincinato – son of the escorialense Rómulo Cincinato – to Rome with him in 1625,<sup>184</sup> presumably for the same reasons that Philip IV would later send Velázquez to Italy. Pacheco recounts the younger Cincinato's great success with a portrait of Urban VIII, which was unfortunately followed not long after by the painter's sudden death. Alcalá is also thought to have served as the intermediary who commissioned an influential painting of the Immaculate Conception from a recalcitrant Guido Reni in Rome in 1627.<sup>185</sup> The picture was intended for the Infanta María, Philip IV's sister. Pacheco also records Alcalá's patronage of Artemesia Gentileschi, several of whose pictures were among the pieces the duke sent back to Seville.<sup>186</sup>

In spite of the opposition of his predecessor, the Duque de Alba, Alcalá was appointed Viceroy of Naples in 1629, entering the city on 17 August of that year.<sup>187</sup> His principal associate at the time was Don Alonso de Cárdenas, a career diplomat who, as we have seen, would later play an important role in the artistic exchange between Spain and England.<sup>188</sup> In Rome, Alcalá had been a patron of Artemesia Gentileschi and of the Bamboccianti; in Naples, he became a patron of Ribera, who referred to himself as the duke's "Apelles," a relationship cut short by Alcalá's recall to Spain in 1631.<sup>189</sup> (The unusual subject of the Venturi portrait may relate to the duke's scientific interests, as indicated by the many navigational, mathematic, and scientific instruments in his 1637 inventory.) Ribera's Teoxenia (partially destroyed in 1734; fragments in the Prado) has been related to a Hellenistic relief in the Alcalá collection,<sup>190</sup> while Ribera's Christ Being Prepared for the Cross (Cogulludo, Santa María), four images of philosophers (probably the works now in the Prado), and at least two other works by Ribera were recorded in his inventories.<sup>191</sup> He also possessed works by Andrea del Sarto, il Cavaliere d'Arpino, Guido Reni, and Guercino.

Alcalá's tenure in Naples was brief, ending in 1631, but he soon returned to Italy, serving as Viceroy of Sicily from 1632. Even from Sicily, he continued to commission works of art – including a Mater Dolorosa from Ribera – in Naples.<sup>192</sup> Charged with an embassy to the Holy Roman Empire, he died at Villach in 1637.<sup>193</sup> Alcalá's death inventories were taken in Seville and in Genoa, in preparation for an almoneda there in the late spring of 1637.<sup>194</sup> (The choice of Genoa is not explained: perhaps the duke had left his belongings there in anticipation of either shipment to Germany or return to Seville. Genoa was an ally of Spain, had a direct maritime link to the Peninsula, supported a wealthy and cultured mercantile class, and had a large Spanish community. It may have been chosen as the best location for an auction.)

Very few of the works recorded in Genoa were attributed, although these few are of some interest. There were two pictures by Titian – a St. Lawrence and a Head (evaluated at only 80 reales) – along with a piece by Caracciolo, a Miracle of a Female Saint attributed to Caravaggio, the already mentioned Mater Dolorosa by Ribera, and another work, an Apollo Flaying Marsyas, which may be one of Ribera's versions of this theme.<sup>195</sup>

Also of interest in the Genoa inventory are the several additional works attributed to Bamboccio (Pieter van Laer), although the Dutch artist's name could have been used as a generic term for a type of lowlife scene. As Haskell has demonstrated, Spanish patrons were especially important in the rise of the Bamboccianti in Italy.<sup>196</sup> Michelangelo Cerquozzi, for example, was so identified with his Spanish and Hispanophile patrons that he affected Spanish dress, and Alcalá's successor, the Conde de Monterrey, may have also been one of his early patrons. Furthermore, van Laer dedicated a series of eight engravings of animals to Alcalá in 1635 or 1636,<sup>197</sup> although it is not clear if these appear in the 1637 inventory. (At least one estampa was inventoried among Alcalá's pictures, but the evaluations on the lots given to Bamboccio, 100–200 reales, seem too high for them to be prints.) In any event, the inventory documents Alcalá's patronage of genre subjects.

Since the 1637 Alcalá inventory was taken for an almoneda, many of the works mentioned never reached Spain. Nevertheless, the sale was so well attended by members of the duke's household and by the Spanish community in Genoa that some portion of the collection might have found its way to the Iberian Peninsula. Furthermore, the long roster of buyers (many of whom were presumably creditors of the duke's estate) bears witness to the widespread dissemination of works of art that the almonedas brought about. The social strata represented by the buyers were equally diverse. At one end of the spectrum were nobles like the Marqués de Alcanizas and hidalgo members of the Spanish community, like Cárdenas and "the Secretary" Herrera. At the other end were people identified by only one name. In between were three members of the Spinola clan, as well as other Italians such as "Raggio" and "Imperiale," and a host of non-noble Spaniards. This pattern will also be seen to apply to estate sales in Madrid, where people of all walks of life were able to acquire works of art.

Collectors in the Circle of Olivares: The Monterrey Collection

Alcalá's collection differed from those assembled later in the seventeenth century in that it was intended to decorate a palace in Seville rather than in Madrid. Among the policies of the new king, Philip IV, and his privado, Olivares, was an attempt to centralize power around the Crown. As the contemporary phrase put it, "Solo Madrid es corte" – "only Madrid is the court." By about 1630, this meant that Madrid had become the principal seat of most of the nobility as well as the king. Although the great wealth of Seville continued to mean that important collections could be assembled there (especially by members of the second rank of nobility, the lesser aristocracy, and merchants), the galleries of the greatest nobles were increasingly to be found exclusively at Madrid.

One of the first great private collections assembled during the reign of Philip IV was that of Don Manuel de Azevedo y Zúñiga and Doña Leonor María de Guzmán, 6th Condes de Monterrey. Don Manuel's career, including his relationship with the royal collections discussed above, is in many ways typical of the great collectors of the age. Monterrey was closely linked to Olivares: each had married the other's sister. The resulting interlocking of the houses of Monterrey, Olivares, and Haro (the Marqueses del Carpio, Olivares' kinsmen) created a potent political alliance with ramifications in the world of art collecting.

Don Manuel benefited greatly from his family ties. As the stars of Zúñiga and Olivares rose at court, more and more members of their interrelated houses received governmental positions. The members of the family also participated in Olivares' vision of his family's service to the State. In keeping with the example set by the Conde-Duque, Don Manuel helped support the intellectual life of the capital, and in 1622 the sessions of the Madrid Academy were transferred to the house of Francisco de Mendoza, secretary to Monterrey.<sup>198</sup> In 1628, Don Manuel was appointed Ambassador in Rome; he was then Viceroy of Naples from 1631–37. It is noteworthy that, at the end of the seventeenth century, the Neapolitan historian Parrino cited Don Manuel's marital ties with Olivares to explain his appointment as viceroy.<sup>199</sup> mino record Monterrey's intervention on Velázquez's behalf when the painter sought summer lodging in the Villa Medici during his first visit to Italy, 1629–31, and a French visitor to Italy, J.J. Bouchard, left the following description of Monterrey's palace (apparently in Rome, although the conde was already in Naples) in 1632:

[The gallery of the Palace] was filled by the Conde de Monterrey with an infinity of beautiful originals by Raphael, Titian, and other excellent painters, which [pictures] have been grabbed up in Naples and Rome. [There were] rich furnishings in the rooms and a quantity of silver-ware.... and a little library filled with good books.<sup>201</sup>

Furthermore, the Monterrey inventory of 1653 (see Docs. 57 and 58 below) demonstrates that the conde's gallery also displayed works by contemporary Roman artists, such as the Cavaliere d'Arpino (nos. 99–100) and Antonio Tempesta (nos. 26, 97), as well as by Bolognese artists whose market centered in Rome (Reni and Albani, nos. 75, 217). As has been noted, there is also reason to suppose that Monterrey was buying works by Cerquozzi at this time.<sup>202</sup> Haskell, citing the notice by Bouchard just quoted, suggests that Don Manuel may also have acquired many of his Renaissance works in Rome before his appointment to Naples.<sup>203</sup> Later, in the mid-1630s, Monterrey undertook the transport of the two Aldobrandini works by Titian already discussed with regard to the royal collections (Prado, nos. 418 and 419).

Don Manuel's tenure in Naples was marked by a great surge of artistic activity there. In addition to supporting resident artists such as his fellow Spaniard, Ribera, and Stanzone – and encouraging the Neapolitan-born sculptor, Giuliano Finelli, to return from Rome – the new viceroy also brought Lanfranco to Naples in 1634 and protected Domenichino, who had arrived in 1630–31.<sup>204</sup> Furthermore, commissions from Don Manuel stimulated the careers of the younger generation of Neapolitan masters.

Two major projects dominated Monterrey's viceregal patronage in Naples. First, there was the assembling of a large group of pictures for the Buen Retiro Palace in Madrid, then under construction (already discussed above). The second artistic project was his commission for a high altar to be shipped to the Convent and Church of the Agustinas Descalzas (Recoletas) in Salamanca, Spain, which he clearly undertook in partnership with his wife, who had a picture collection in her own right. The Monterreys began to build the Descalzas convent in 1636, thus superseding an earlier scheme for the redecoration of the Church of the Ursuline Nuns, also in Salamanca.<sup>205</sup> The the Count and Countess spent." (Pita did not find any mention of Velázquez, whose visit to Italy in 1629 he was researching, but he did note a payment to Saavedra Fajardo.) I have been unable to locate the documents cited by Pita. A set of expense journals, dated in Italy from 1621? to 1622, do exist in the Alba Archives at the Palacio de Liria (Sección Monterrey, caja 147, sections 111–156), but they could not have originated in Monterrey's embassy, which took place in 1628–1631. The journals probably originated with the Duque de Alba, who was en route to the Viceroyalty of Naples at that time (see the Document).

Haskell and Felton assume that both Lanfranco and Domenichino came to Naples of their own volition and were subsequently appropriated, as it were, by the Viceroy. Brown and Elliott claim that Monterrey "invited" both artists to Naples.

205. Documents relating to the original commission for the (Ursuline) high altar were published by U. Protagiurleo 1957; relevant excerpts may be found in Felton 1982, p. 174 note 9. Brown and Elliott 1980, pp. 116

Descalzas altarpiece included architectural decorations by Cosimo Fanzago, sculptures by Finelli, an Immaculate Conception and a Pietà by Ribera, and peripheral paintings by Reni and Lanfranco (all in situ). Other works commissioned for the church include Ribera's St. Januarius and sculpted portraits of the conde and condesa by Finelli. Of course, the Monterrey's patronage of Ribera did not stop with this ensemble: eleven individual pieces and a set of six Heads are attributed to Ribera in the conde's 1653 inventory, along with two other works said to be copies.

Don Manuel's viceroyalty ended on 2 November 1637, and he left Naples ten days later, returning to Madrid that winter.<sup>206</sup> Works of art, including those destined for the Convent at Salamanca, were still arriving at the Monterrey house on the Prado de San Gerónimo across from the Buen Retiro from November 1638 to May 1639.<sup>207</sup> Carducho, writing before 1633, had located "grandiose drawings of The Swimmers in colored chalk by the hand of Michelangelo" in the Monterrey gallery and cited a Holy Family by Raphael, which Don Manuel had obtained from the Carmelitas Descalzas Convent in Valladolid.<sup>208</sup> What is more, most of the former viceroy's choicest contemporary acquisitions were also close at hand, most notably in the Retiro but also, as in the case of Titian's Andrians, in the Royal Collection at the Alcázar.

A lack of information, a certain disorganization and the relatively few works in the Monterrey inventories have made it difficult to arrive at a final assessment of the collection. To understand the activities of the conde and condesa as connoisseurs and patrons, we must therefore look to the Retiro and to Salamanca as well as to Carducho and other documents in order to supplement what we find in the inventories. Even restricting our view to the conde's inventory of 1653, we find that the collection was impressive: 17 works by Ribera (plus two copies), seven works attributed to the Bassani, five or six attributed to Titian (plus one copy and one or two dubious attributions), five to Luca Cambiaso, and lesser numbers to Bellini, Pordenone, Veronese, Raphael, Correggio (copy?), Borgianni, Arpino, Tempesta, Baglione, Reni, Albani, Lanfranco, and Van Dyck. Among plausibly identifiable pictures are an anonymous Venetian Conversation of the Marchese di Pescara and the Madonna of the Parrot by Salviati (Prado, nos. 526 and 177, respectively); the Crucifixion by Lanfranco now in the Agustinas Convent in Salamanca; and, somewhat more controversially, two works by Ribera, SS. Peter and Paul, (nos. 7 and 8 in 1653 – now in Vitoria). A St. Catherine Adoring the Crucifix, no. 72 in 1653, probably the painting now in Boston (no. 48.499), links the collection with the Carpio holdings.<sup>209</sup> The 1655 inventory yields only a bit more information: a mere ten pictures are attributed, and most of these, such as Lanfranco's Crucifixion or Titian's Cupid, are also present in the 1653 list. What the 1655 inventory may tell us is Doña Leonor's contribution to the joint collecting effort, since the pictures listed then seem to have been hers alone. We may be able to assume that those works present in 1653 but absent in 1655 were entailed or passed to the heir rather than remaining in the widow's possession.

Carducho indicates that Don Manuel had the painting by Raphael restored and intended to take it to Italy. Pérez Sánchez identifies it with item 120 in the 1653 inventory. Carducho's report of the Michelangelo drawing is corroborated by contemporary Jesuit letters; see Pérez Sánchez 1977, pp. 419f. – citing Cartas de Jesuitas, in Memorial Histórico Español, 14, pp. 276 and 346.

Although Pérez Sánchez was surprised by the quantity of pictures with secular subject matter (44 percent) in the 1653 inventory, their number was in reality fairly modest, since 17 percent of the collection consisted of portraits. A comparison with the holdings of Don Gaspar de Haro may be instructive here: in Don Gaspar's 1651 inventory, nearly 80 percent of the works were secular in nature. Finally, there are the evaluations set on the bodegones, still lifes, genre pieces, and landscapes in the Monterrey collection. In almost every case, these are very low indeed, suggesting that the gradual appreciation and upward valuation of these works that took place in the seventeenth century had not yet become a reality in Madrid (cf. nos. 166 and 170).

Other Collectors in the Circle of Olivares: The Marqués de Leganés

The fact that those with the most direct access to royal favor had not only the means but also the best opportunities to collect is nowhere more clearly illustrated than in the cases of two other families allied with Olivares: the Marquesses de Leganés and the Marquesses del Carpio. Indeed, the Carpio holdings, had they ever been assembled into one cohesive collection on Spanish soil, would have rivaled the king's galleries, at least in numbers alone. The Leganés collection did not lag far behind; it contained, at the death of the first Marqués in 1655, more than 1,300 pictures, many of the highest quality.<sup>210</sup>

Leganés was born Diego Messía in Madrid around 1585, the fourth son of the Conde de Uceda (who would become an important official in the household of Philip III). Diego was taken to Brussels at an early age and served as a page in the archducal court of the Spanish governors. He returned to Madrid and, in the early 1620s, rose quickly to prominence under the protection of his cousin, the Conde-Duque de Olivares. He was with Spinola at Jülich in 1622 and went on to a prominent military career in the Low Countries, northern Italy, and Catalonia, serving, for example, as Governor of Milan from 1635 to 1641. He was created Marqués de Leganés in 1627 and shortly thereafter married Spinola's daughter, Policena. He changed his name from Messía to Felípe de Guzmán (Olivares' surname) at the time of his marriage.<sup>211</sup> Leganés took pains to ensure that his art collection would be passed on to posterity as a part of his titles.

A comparison of the Leganés inventories of 1630 and 1655 shows that, as a collector, Leganés was both a captive of the circumstances of his career and a connoisseur who grew from dependence into self-assurance. Initially, Leganés developed his collection in imitation of the royal collection, as his inventory of 1630 indicates. At that time, he owned at least eleven works attributed to Titian, along with two works by Massys, two by Rubens, one by Raphael, and one by Correggio.<sup>212</sup> By 1655, however, Leganés had become something of a specialist in Flemish works, including those he had commissioned himself. This specialization probably reflected the many years he spent in the Low Countries, while the commissions and burgeoning size of his collection reflected the increased financial resources at his command after 1630.<sup>213</sup> His resources were equally great during his tenure at Milan, where he apparently acquired his northern Italian works, but the zeal that the Carprios or Monterrey showed for things Italian seems to have been moderated in Leganés by his prior interest in Flemish art.

210. See V. Poleró, "Colección de pinturas que reunió en su palacio el Marqués de Leganés, D. Diego Felipe de Guzman," Boletín de la Sociedad Española de Excursiones, 6, 1898–1899; J. López Navio, 1962, pp. 261–268; and M.C. Volk, "New Light on a Seventeenth Century Collector: The Marquis of Leganés," The Art Bulletin, 62, no. 2, June 1980, pp. 256–268. The present study has relied heavily on Volk's research. See also Sánchez Canton 1923–1941, vol. 2, p. 109.

211. The biography of Leganés was first given in a memorial he submitted to Philip IV in 1643 (London: British Library, Add. mss. 28,453, ff. 3–12 – cited by Volk 1980, p. 256, note 5). Álvarez y Baena, Hijos ilustres de Madrid, 4 vols., 1789/1973, vol. 1, pp. 337–338, and vol. 2, pp. 297–298, gives a summary account of the life of Leganés and that of his son. These are augmented on the basis of documentary evidence by López Navio 1962 and especially by Volk 1980.

The presence of Spaniards in the Low Countries during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and the fact that Flanders was a loyal province (and indeed, primary frontier) of the Spanish Crown, meant that the relationship between Flemish artists and Spanish patrons, as exemplified by Rubens and Philip IV, was especially close. At least in terms of collecting (which is distinct from patronage), Leganés certainly displays this relationship. Indeed, the roster of artists' names in the Leganés collection reads like a history of Flemish art from its Netherlandish beginnings to the mid-seventeenth century: Jan van Eyck, Rogier van der Weyden, Hieronymus Bosch, Joaquim Patinir, and Quentin Metsys among the so-called "primitives," and Peter Paul Rubens, Anthony van Dyck, and Jacob Jordaens among contemporaries.

Although Leganés is best known as a collector of Flemish art, there were also a great many Italian works among the masterpieces in his gallery. According to Carducho,<sup>214</sup> Leganés' interest in Italian art was spurred by Philip IV's gift of two portraits by Titian, one of which seems to have been the Portrait of John Frederick, Elector of Saxony, inventoried in 1630 and now in the Prado (no. 533). Another of the works attributed to Titian in 1630, the Portrait of Federico Gonzaga, Duca di Mantova, may be identified with a second extant canvas, also in the Prado (no. 408).<sup>215</sup> Both of these 213. Leganés' wealth may be estimated by analyzing the wealth of his grandson in 1681. At that time, as H. Kamen 1980 shows (pp. 230–237), the net income of the mayorazgo estate of Leganés was 10,000 ducats a year. (Kamen assumes that this figure is over and above the costs of the noble household.) It is likely that the income of the estate was roughly the same, and the buying power of a ducat much greater, in 1630. To the estate income may be added the salaries of Leganés as general, governor, etc., and the expense money and local taxes available to him in the course of his overseas duties. We may therefore assume that Leganés had at least 15–20,000 ducats of disposable income per year, and probably much more. (This would mean something like $3–6 million or more per year, in 1990s dollars.) As has already been noted, following López Navio 1962, p. 264, the enemies of Leganés in Madrid claimed that his loss of 50,000 escudos in the defeat at Casal de Monferrato in 1640 was "child's play," and suggested that "the Indies seem to produce money to satisfy the will (la dicha) of this man." (See the Memorial Histórico Español, 15, pp. 450ff.)

214. Carducho 1633, f. 155v – reprinted in Sánchez Canton, 1923–1941 vol. 2, p. 109.

215. Wethey 1971, vol. 2, no. 49, p. 107; see Volk 1980, p. 258 and note 15. Volk assumes that another work by Titian, a Portrait of the Duke of Florence with his Hand on an Artillery Piece (no. 18 in 1655; called a Duke of Ferrara in 1630 and a Duke of Urbino in the royal inventories of 1666, 1686, and 1700), was lost in the Alcázar fire of 1734. Wethey, however, tentatively identifies the Alcázar picture with a Portrait of Alfonso d'Este, Duke of Ferrara in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, no. 27.56. Wethey attributes this work to Titian, although the museum considers it a copy. (Cf. F. Zeri and E.E. Gardner, Italian Paintings: Venetian School, New York and Greenwich 1973, pp. 82–83, who suggest a seventeenth-century hand and speculate on the possibility of Rubens' authorship.) If the New York work is indeed attributable to Titian, its history must include the Leganés collection. In any event, since the Alcázar picture had been in the Spanish royal collection before Leganés came to own it – indeed, since 1533 – Leganés must have received it as a gift from Philip IV. This explains his bequest of it to the king in 1655, along with the two portraits by Titian mentioned in Carducho. (The bequest is noted in the inventory entry for item 18: "esta pintura no se taso porque la dió su exca en bida a su mgd.") Leganés was, in effect, returning a picture which he had on loan. Perhaps the fourth work which Leganés bequeathed to the king (a Portrait of the Duke of Alba, item 14 in 1655) had also been Philip's in the first place.

works exemplify Titian's portraiture at the height of his career. By 1655, the Italian contingent in the Leganés collection, although decidedly a minority of the attributed masterpieces, remained significant, comprising more than 200 works, not to mention those whose description merely implied an Italian origin.<sup>216</sup> Leganés had made use of his stay in Italy to acquire additional works by Titian, along with pieces by Palma, Veronese, and other Venetian masters. The northern Italian masters Correggio and Parmigianino were also represented in his collection, along with Cesare da Sesto, Gaudentio Ferrari, and an anonymous follower of Leonardo. There were works by the reformed mannerists and the later, academic mannerists, including works attributed to Cigoli, Scipione Pulzone, Il Cerano, Procaccini, Morazzone, and the Cavaliere d'Arpino – not to mention more than 20 works attributed to the Bassani. Many of these artists had lived or worked in Milan, so purchases by Leganés might merely have reflected the opportunities of the local art market, but it is also likely that he was responding to the similarities between northern Italian naturalism and the dominant style in early seventeenth-century Spain. Contemporary Milanese art was represented by the work of Francesco del Cairo and by that of many anonymous artists; the artist called “Muson” might also have been a contemporary Milanese, or perhaps Giralomo Muziano. There was also a work attributed to Caravaggio and six to Ribera.<sup>217</sup>

A surprising strong point in the Leganés collection was the gathering of Spanish works. By 1655, Leganés had acquired pictures attributed to El Mudo, Pantoja de la Cruz, Sánchez Coello, and Antonio Moro. Contemporary Spanish art was represented by Ribera (already mentioned), Velázquez (seven or eight works), Collantes, and a number of lesser masters. Many of the anonymous works were probably Spanish as well. Leganés also seems to have been a significant patron, or at least a major collector, of the work of Juan van der Hamen y Leon. Not only were many fruteros and dessert still lifes attributed to van der Hamen in the Leganés inventory of 1655, but there was also a series of portraits of contemporary literary figures including Lope de Vega, Rioja, and Quevedo. According to the Leganés inventories published by Volk, most of these works had been purchased by 1642.<sup>218</sup> As Volk points out, the number of Spanish pictures in the collection was limited, but even so small a group represents an exception to the lack of interest in Spanish art that characterized many important private collections.

The Marqués de Frómista y Caracena

Another example of collaboration between noble Spanish patrons and Flemish artists is that of David Teniers the Younger and Don Luis de Benavides Carrillo de Toledo, Marqués de Frómista y Caracena and Conde de Pinto (1608–68, in the Low Countries from 1656), whose collection was inventoried in 1668.<sup>219</sup> At his death, Frómista y Caracena possessed 187 lots of paintings and an enormous library (including Teniers' Teatrum of 1660), most of which represented his long service in Flanders and a tour of duty in Milan. At the death of the marqués the Frómista y Caracena gallery held 20 pictures by Teniers, plus two collaborative efforts with Jacques d'Artois, which document the patronage of the marqués, along with other works attributed to Brueghel, Rubens, Snyders, and Van Dyck. We also know that the marqués obtained Correggio's Agony in the Garden for Philip IV, probably in 1656 at the end of his tour of duty in Milan (1648–56).<sup>220</sup> Other souvenirs of his Italian sojourn may be found in the works by Titian, Tintoretto, Veronese, and the Bassani (the usual Venetian representation), as well as by Pordenone, Luca Cambiaso, Guido Reni, Viviano Codazzi, and Francesco del Cairo, who had come to Milan at the same time as Frómista.<sup>221</sup>

The Fuensaldaña Collection

Recent studies by Alexander Vergara have elucidated the role of David Teniers the Younger in acquiring pictures in London and the Low Countries after the English civil war.<sup>222</sup> The chief beneficiary of this activity was Alonso Pérez de Vivero, III Conde de Fuensaldaña, an important figure in Spanish policy of the era who was born around 1600 and died in 1661. He was the highest-ranking military officer in the Netherlands from 1643 to the early 1650s and sporadically thereafter. His interest in art is documented in Teniers' image of the Archduke Leopold-Wilhelm, Governor of the Netherlands, in his picture gallery as well as in the Haro-Cárdenas correspondence already cited. In 1651, he intervened significantly in the English Commonwealth sales following Charles I's death, buying, among other items, ten tapestries and at least 44 paintings. As Vergara points out, our list of Fuensaldaña's pictures that we have from the Alba Archives is probably annotated by Don Gaspar de Haro, Don Luis de Haro's son, indicating the collections where the pictures then resided. We should remember that Luis de Haro was aware of Fuensaldaña's activities and that at least 22 of the works entered the Carpio collections. Don Luis also probably obtained some of them for the king. Among the pictures identified are Titian's Portrait of Daniele Barbaro (Prado 414), Van Dyck's St. Francis with a Skull (Prado 1478), and Veronese's Sacrifice of Abraham and St. Mary Magdalene (both Prado, nos. 500 and 498).

Castrillo and Medina de las Torres

Two other members of Olivares' circle, the Conde del Castrillo and the Duque de Medina de las Torres, are also known to have acquired fine pictures. Both Castrillo and Medina were related to Olivares by marriage, and they shared two further characteristics: each of them hated the other, and each is known to have given pictures to Philip IV.<sup>223</sup> The few remaining records of Castrillo's collection suggest very little of interest. The handful of works sold at his almoneda in 1671 were greatly overshadowed by his large library, and the pictures inventoried upon the death of his wife (or daughter?) in 1686 seem to have come from Don Gaspar de Guzmán, Marqués del Carpio.<sup>224</sup> However, Castrillo was said by contemporary chroniclers to have given part of his collection to Philip IV,<sup>225</sup> and his better pictures may have escaped the inventory or been hidden under some other rubric.

The collecting career of Medina de las Torres, whose inventory is included in the present study (Doc. 83) is fairly well documented.<sup>226</sup> The son-in-law of Olivares, he was originally the Marqués de Toral, but was created a duque at Olivares' request; he served as Viceroy of Naples from 1637 to 1644. Medina de las Torres' gallery, and his ownership of works by Juan de Jaureguí, were mentioned by Carducho in 1633,<sup>227</sup> and, as we have seen, he gave a number of highly important works to Philip IV throughout his career. Tormó, Trapier, and Felton assume that Medina de las Torres commissioned the two canvases of St. Peter and St. Paul now in Vitoria, but they may have been in the Monterrey collection before 1653.<sup>228</sup> The suggestion that Medina de las Torres also commissioned Ribera's Clubfoot Boy (Louvre, no. 1725) also seems plausible, but there is no secure documentation.<sup>229</sup> Moreover, Medina de las Torres' patronage of two of Ribera's most important works, the Dream of Jacob and the Liberation of St. Peter (Madrid: Prado, nos. 1117 and 1073) is probable, although the identification has been criticized.<sup>230</sup> In the light of his gifts to Philip and his ownership of works by Ribera, one might expect to find Medina de las Torres in possession of a splendid picture gallery, but in fact the collection inventoried upon his death is disappointing in both size and quality. Although it is possible that the true extent of Medina's holdings has somehow remained hidden, it is more likely that he was following the precedent of Olivares, who appears not to have collected works of art in order to avoid competing with Philip. It might also suggest that Medina de las Torres had acquired many of the masterpieces either as an agent for Philip or with the prior intent to give them to the royal collection, keeping only the works documented here for his own gallery.

The Carpio Collection

As we have already noted, two members of the Olivares circle, Don Luis de Haro and his son, Don Gaspar de Haro y Guzmán, sixth and seventh Marqueses del Carpio, joined the almirantes and the Marqués de Leganés in the elite circle of collectors whose holdings may be thought of as rivaling those of Philip IV in size. (The Carpios are also discussed at length in the entries introducing their documents; see these entries for biographical details not included in the following summary.)

Luis Méndez de Haro y Guzmán (1598–1661) succeeded Olivares as privado of 230. In the catalogue of the recent Ribera exhibition (Pérez Sánchez and Spinosa 1992, pp. 102 and 139), Pérez Sánchez suggests that Medina's pictures were the Jacob with the Flocks of Laban (1632) and the Liberation of Saint Peter now at the Escorial. Although Pérez Sánchez rightly notes that there is no reason that Medina might not have collected two earlier works, rather than commissioned two new ones, this assumes that Ribera, who seems generally to have been working on commissions in the 1630s, had two pictures of roughly the same size on two unusual Biblical subjects "in stock" and ready to sell to Medina. It is not clear, moreover, that the two Escorial works were conceived as a pair: the Dream of Joseph and the Liberation of Saint Peter both show angelic intervention in human affairs, but how might one relate Peter's release to the story of Laban laying peeled rods? Finally, it seems more likely that the works dated from Medina's viceroyalty would have been commissioned by him.

Philip IV in the 1640s, although he discreetly avoided being called the king's favorite in public. In this, he fulfilled what we have seen as one of the most important requirements for success as a collector in Golden Age Spain: proximity to the royal person. Indeed, historians and his contemporaries, including, as we have seen, his son and even King Philip IV himself, have commented upon Don Luis's sympathetic relationship with the monarch.

Don Luis's collecting activities attracted the attention of his contemporaries as early as 1638, but the first record we have of the Haro family collection is the inventory taken in 1648 after the death of Doña Catalina, Don Luis's wife (Doc. 45). Only one painting in eight is attributed in the inventory, but we can still form some idea of the general shape of the collection from attributions to Sánchez Coello and Ribera and to many Flemish painters, including Van Dyck and Brueghel. There was also a Christ Washing the Disciples' Feet (which should not be confused with a work by Tintoretto of the same subject now in the Prado, which was purchased by Don Luis in 1654 and given to Philip IV for the sacristy of the Escorial) and at least one work attributed to Bassano. Don Luis also owned Velázquez's Balthasar Carlos in the Riding School, now in the Grosvenor estate.

The collection was in some ways typical of Spanish collections of the age: Venetian art and the late Cinquecento were honored, over three-fifths of the works were religious, and most of the secular pieces were either portraits or Flemish landscapes. At the same time – unlike many other noble collections and the royal collection – the 1648 Carpio collection displays a remarkable bias toward Italian art. If we take only those attributed paintings that a connoisseur might value for reasons beyond purely decorative function, nearly three-quarters are Italian (four-fifths if we count Ribera). Likewise, Spanish artists with strong ties to Italy prevail: Navarrete, Velázquez, and (again) Ribera. Even among the Flemings, the emphasis falls on Van Dyck, a particularly Italianate master. Rubens is conspicuously absent.

Alas, the inventory taken upon Don Luis's death in 1661 has survived only in undocumented copies of circa 1802, so that it is impossible to say with certainty how many of the pictures inventoried at the death of his son, Don Gaspar, in 1689, were in fact Don Luis's, unless Don Luis had mentioned certain pictures in his correspondence with Cárdenas. We know that Don Luis went on to collect many significant works – not to mention those he gave to the king.

It is possible to make a few general and several detailed observations. In the first place, Flemish works are somewhat more prominent in Don Luis's presumed 1661 gallery, and the proportion of secular to religious works has been reversed, with nearly two-thirds of the listed works being secular.<sup>231</sup> The names of Rubens and possibly Holbein, Stanzione, Paul de Vos, Bocanegra, Dürer, Orrente, and either Murillo or Procaccini have been added to the 1648 roster. Among the Flemish and other northern works were a landscape by Kierincx, one secular and two religious works by Rubens, and three works by Van Dyck, including a St. Francis with an Angel, probably now in the Prado (no. 1478). Portraits and landscapes still dominate the secular works.

From the Venetian school there were six pieces by or attributed to the Bassani, including an Expulsion of the Moneylenders, a Forge of Vulcan, and two pictures from Fuensaldaña.<sup>232</sup> There were at least three works by Giorgione, as many as nine by Palma Vecchio, and two by Andrea Schiavone. Seventeen works by or attributed to Titian came to Don Luis, including an Adoration of the Magi from Fuensaldaña,<sup>233</sup> a St. Margaret,<sup>234</sup> and a Nativity.<sup>235</sup> Among the secular works by Titian were portraits of Charles Bourbon, Constable of France,<sup>236</sup> of a Duchessa di Ferrara,<sup>237</sup> and of other, unidentified sitters. There was a Venus, Psyche, and Cupid,<sup>238</sup> a Lucretia and Tarquin, and a second Venus and Adonis, which Don Luis gave or sold to the Almirante de Castilla.<sup>239</sup> Works by Tintoretto included a Supper at Emmaus<sup>240</sup> and eight unspecified altarpieces. Veronese was represented by a Kneeling Magdalene (now in the Prado, no. 498), a Magdalene with an Angel, and possibly a Christ Healing the Centurion's Servant.<sup>241</sup> There were also a number of portraits and secular works by Veronese.

From the other Italian schools, Don Luis bought for himself a Holy Family with St. John by Barocci; six Correggios, including the Mercury, Venus, and Cupid; two large pieces by Gentileschi; at least four works by Parmigianino; at least one Perugino; and three works by Andrea del Sarto. Raphael was represented by a tapestry cycle, the Medici Cardinals, and a Madonna and Child with St. John, which was either left to Philip IV in Don Luis's will or included in the works sent to the Escorial. From Guido Reni came a Venus, Cupid, and Three Nymphs,<sup>242</sup> a Portia, and a Lucretia.<sup>243</sup> Needless to add, such a collection was extraordinary by the standards of its (or any other) age!

Don Luis's respect for art was not limited to his lifetime. In his will of 1658, Don Luis specified that two sets of tapestries, including a set of The Acts of the Apostles after Raphael, and a group of paintings were to be incorporated into the mayorazgo of El Carpio. Like Leganés, Benavente, and other nobles, Don Luis implied that his suc-

233. Possibly now in the Prado, no. 433, although the Prado dimensions (1.41 x 2.19 m.) do not match those of an Adoration of the Magi, attributed to Titian, in the 1689 inventory, Doc. 115, no. 242 (2½ x 2 varas = 1.89 x 1.68 m.). Wethey 1969, p. 66, no. 4, gives the Prado canvas to Titian and workshop, and suggests a provenance to Antonio Pérez. In any case, the Haro picture should not be confused with Titian's Adoration of the Magi in the Escorial, which was always there – see Wethey 1969, p. 65.

234. Possibly now in the Kisters Collection, Kreuzlingen; bought at the Charles I sale, after 1650, for £100. The picture has no provenance from 1650 to 1806, but the latter date may indicate a Spanish sojourn. Cf. the Haro dimensions of 2+ x 1½ varas = ~1.75 x 1.50 m.; Charles I sale = 1.88 x 1.60 m.; Kreuzlingen = 1.98 x 1.676 m. Information cited from Wethey 1969, p. 142, no. 118.

235. A copy of Titian's Nativity in the Uffizi, Florence, is found in the collection of Christ Church, Oxford (.937 x 1.12 m.). This copy was in the collection of Charles I, but it has no provenance from 1650 to 1751/65 – see Wethey 1969, p. 142, no. 118. A Nativity was attributed to Titian in the 1689 Carpio inventory (Doc. 115, no. 266) and measured 1½ varas (1.26 m.) square.

236. Probably now in Bilbao: Private Collection; Wethey 1971, p. 156, no. X-14 (as by a “minor follower”).

237. Now lost; Wethey 1971, p. 197, no. L-11.

238. (Doc. 115, no. 354.) This piece was probably similar to Titian's Allegory of the Marchese del Vasto. The Allegory was purchased in Spain by Charles I, but it was in France in 1683 – see Wethey 1975, p. 128, no. 1. Cf. also Wethey, p. 129, for a similar subject in the Alcázar in 1686.

240. De Vecchi 1970, no. 18.

241. The marginal note to item 1, Palacio de Liria, Madrid, Alba Archives, caja 182–194 indicates that the painting purchased by Cárdenas in London was thought to be the Centurion by Veronese inventoried in 1689 (Doc. 115, no. 371) (2+ x 2– varas). The marginal note is probably in error, as Cárdenas' purchase was almost certainly sent to the Escorial and had markedly different dimensions (2½ x 3½ varas). The documents do not indicate that Cárdenas purchased two Centurions, but the possibility cannot be excluded. See T. Pignatti, Veronese, vol. 1, Venice 1976, p. 133, no. 165, with copies, nos. A66, A130, and A183. Veronese's Christ and the Centurion was installed in the prior's chapter house of the Escorial. Item 1, Palacio de Liria, Madrid, Alba Archives, caja 182–194 is 2½ x 3½ varas = 1.92 x 2.76 m.; now in the Prado, no. 492 (1.92 x 2.97 m.). See Prado 1972, citing Santos 1657, for provenance.

242. Cf. London: National Gallery, no. 90 (2.819 x 2.057 m.); the 1689 Carpio inventory, item 7, gives a width of 4¾ varas (3.93 m.). Levey 1971, pp. 190–191, doubts the attribution of the London picture to Reni and denies that it was in Charles I's collection.

243. Possibly in the Prado, no. 208 (as workshop of Reni; 0.70 x 0.57 m., with earliest provenance to Isabel Farnese's collection at Aranjuez, 1746). There are no dimensions for this piece in the Carpio inventories.

cessors would be lords not only of given pieces of geography and certain castles but also of a specified group of paintings as well.

It has already been demonstrated that, in many cases, Don Luis's collecting was typical of the age. But it was also more conservative. Of all the artists mentioned in the 1648 inventory and the Haro-Cárdenas correspondence, only Velázquez was alive in 1655. (Stanzione and Paul de Vos, who appear by 1661, were also alive.) Orrente, Borgianni, Gentileschi, Reni, Ribera, Paul de Vos, Keirincx, Van Dyck, and Rubens had all been Don Luis's contemporaries, but most of these were dead or inactive by 1648 and were in any case artists whose importance had long been established. "The tree is best measured," runs a Spanish proverb, "after it has fallen."

Don Luis's conservatism can also be seen in the Seicento styles represented in his collection. Like many other Spanish collectors, he was not drawn to the more radical manifestations of the Baroque. He did collect tenebrist works, as the pictures by Borgianni, Ribera, Gentileschi, and the younger Reni in his collection indicate, but tenebrism was old-fashioned by 1648. What is more, when artists like Ribera and Velázquez moved away from tenebrism, they did so in the direction of classicism and the "grand manner": that is, in the direction of the High Renaissance. Even the Italianate bias of Don Luis's collecting may be understood as a conservative quality: Italy was the source of fine art and indeed, of much of European culture. The collectors in Don Luis's circle had read Vasari, and they considered the High Renaissance to be the standard against which, as Don Luis himself indicates, contemporary artists were to be judged. In this context, Don Luis's preference for Italian art, for Navarrete and Velázquez, for the more Italianate Van Dyck over Rubens, may be understood as an attempt "to get back to the source."

Of course, not all the evidence for Don Luis's activities as a collector survives. But we have enough information to recognize in Don Luis a man who did not like to take chances. In art, as in politics, all his trees had to be measured. He not only wanted fine works, he wanted these works to be certified by experts, acclaimed, recognized in public. His son, the seventh Marqués del Carpio, would prove more adventurous.

Don Gaspar de Haro

Don Luis de Haro's successor in the estates of Carpio and Olivares was his son, Don Gaspar de Haro y Guzmán (1629–1687), who was known to his contemporaries as the Marqués de Eliche.<sup>244</sup> It would be difficult to imagine two men with less in common. Whereas Don Luis was known for his loyal, self-effacing, almost passive political service, as well as for his circumspection, chastity, and quiet good taste, Don Gaspar was 244. The first half of Don Gaspar's life is discussed at length by Andrés 1975, passim. See also Álvarez y Baena 1789/90/1973, vol. 2, pp. 298–301, and (on Don Gaspar's brother, Don Juan Domingo de Haro, Conde de Monterrey) vol. 3, pp. 282–284. See also J. Ezquerro del Bayo, El Palacete de la Moncloa, Madrid 1929, and G. Maura Gamazo, Carlos II y su Corte, Madrid 1911, vol. 1, pp. 629ff. See also García Carraffa, vol. 42 (40), pp. 294ff., and Paz y Espeso 1948. The basic contemporary sources for Don Gaspar's life are (1) the accounts of Barrionuevo and his successors (A. Paz y Melia, ed., vols. 1–4, Madrid 1892–1894 – reprinted as two vols. in 1969; cited here as "Barrionuevo" and "Anonymous Chronicler, in Barrionuevo"); (2) the various official papers relating to the Buen Retiro bomb episode (Biblioteca Nacional, Madrid, ms. 6751, ff. 110–111 and ms. no. 2280, entire volume); and (3) an anonymous but highly complimentary and therefore almost certainly authorized biography sent to Don Gaspar's second wife ca. 1676–1682 (Biblioteca Nacional, Madrid, Sección de Manuscritos, ms. 18722-56), possibly written by Vélez de León (see G. de Andrés, El Marqués de Eliche: bibliofilo y coleccionista de arte, Madrid, pp. 28 and 46–47); and (4) a very brief mention of Don Gaspar's appointment as Viceroy of Naples in Parrino 1692, vol. 3, pp. 575–577. Additional information from these sources is summarized in the entry preceding Don Gaspar's documents, below.

rebellious, aggressive, egocentric, ostentatious, and licentious. On only one count, in fact, did the son resemble the father: both were avid collectors of paintings. Indeed, Don Gaspar may well rank, at least in terms of quantity, as the foremost private collector of his age. At his death in 1687, his collection numbered more than 3,000 works, including 1,200 in Spain and approximately 1,800 more in Italy, and there is reason to suspect the count is highly incomplete.

Don Gaspar's cultural activities were not limited to art collecting. During the 1650s, Don Luis secured the offices of montero mayor and alcaide of the Buen Retiro, Zarzuela, and El Pardo palaces for his son.<sup>245</sup> As Andrés has pointed out, these positions made Don Gaspar responsible for entertaining the king.<sup>246</sup> In fulfillment of this responsibility, Don Gaspar produced the dramas, masques, operas, and other royal entertainments at the Buen Retiro, cultivating an attachment to the theater which would persist to the end of his life.<sup>247</sup> Barrionuevo describes a number of sumptuous entertainments, often mounted at Don Gaspar's personal expense,<sup>248</sup> and Palomino mentions that Don Gaspar brought Dionisio Mantovano to the Buen Retiro from Italy around 1656–58 to engineer the machine plays in the palace theater.<sup>249</sup> Don Gaspar was also credited, in 1658, with reorganizing the existing theatrical companies of Madrid.<sup>250</sup> As alcaide of the Buen Retiro, he was responsible for the improvements necessitated by Philip IV's increased use of that palace after his second marriage.

Don Gaspar was also a significant patron of contemporary art. Palomino suggests that Don Gaspar commissioned the frescoes that Angelo Michele Colonna and Agostino Mitelli painted in the Church of St. Paul the Hermit in the Retiro gardens.<sup>251</sup> Don Gaspar also employed Colonna and Mitelli at his own newly constructed residence. Palomino reports extensive work at the jardín, including an Atlas by Colonna that held a representation of the celestial sphere.<sup>252</sup> After Mitelli's death in August 1660, Don Gaspar asked Colonna, along with Francisco Rizi and Juan Carreño de Miranda, to decorate the "Casa de la Huerta," a villa on the road to El Pardo Palace that Don Gaspar had recently purchased. (It is now known as the "Palacete de la Moncloa".)<sup>253</sup> In addition, Don Gaspar acquired works by – and presumably, from – Velázquez (The "Rokeby" Venus and other pieces),<sup>254</sup> Mazo (Olivares on a White Horse, The Siege of Pamplona, and copies after Titian),<sup>255</sup> and Nardi.<sup>256</sup>

The decoration of the Palacete de la Moncloa was connected to other aspects of Don Gaspar's career as a patron and a collector. The house itself was one of a number of country places that Don Gaspar acquired, possibly as a convenience for his duties as montero mayor and alcaíde of El Pardo.<sup>257</sup> All three of the artists who participated in the decoration had already been associated with Don Gaspar's projects. Colonna, as has already been mentioned, had worked at the Buen Retiro, and Carreño had decorated the bier at Don Gaspar's mother's funeral in 1647.<sup>258</sup> Rizi was a theatrical designer as well as a painter and had collaborated with Mantovano on a number of commissions. He later became the principal scene designer and theatrical engineer at the Buen Retiro.<sup>259</sup>

The ceilings of the Palacete were supposedly done by Colonna, while Rizi and Carreño supervised an unspecified number of Spanish painters in the decoration of the walls. According to Palomino, the decorative program consisted of fresco copies of famous masterpieces.

They copied with great accuracy, on the walls, all the best pictures that could be had. Here are Raphael, Titian, Veronese, van Dyck, Velázquez, and many others, with golden frames, likewise painted, and cloth hangings imitated most famously. And on the house's exterior walls were painted, in fresco, sundials with notable curiosities, which could show the sun on such and such a day; but all these things have been ruined by the ravages of time.<sup>260</sup>

Dionisio Mantovano probably also collaborated in the decoration of the Palacete. In 1674, the Imperial Ambassador, Harrach, visited the site and attributed the paintings on the lower story (Böden) to Mantovano.<sup>261</sup> Harrach did not say whether the work was on the interior or exterior of the house.

In effect, Don Gaspar had created an imaginary "collection" after the works of the respected artists who dominated his father's gallery, lacking only Correggio. The canon of taste had been passed on from father to son. But Don Gaspar had also acquired his own collection of movable pictures, which exhibited a wider range of interests. What is more, the two picture collections do not overlap, except for two works specified as gifts from Don Luis. We must therefore assume that, by the age of 22, Don Gaspar had already launched his career as an independent collector.

Don Luis had implicitly emphasized the social values of works of art; Don Gaspar's interests were more inclined toward the acquisition of art for its own sake. His aesthetic sensitivity appeared, for example, in the increased percentage of attributed Court gossip (cited by Andrés 1975, p. 11) held that Don Gaspar's houses were maintained for his mistresses, but the location of the Palacete de la Moncloa suggests that the houses were more related to his royal duties. The Moncloa site would have been especially convenient, as it still is today, to El Pardo, as well as to the Casa del Campo's game park, the Torre de la Parada, and the road to El Escorial.

261. Harrach visited Don Gaspar's "Casa de la Huerta" on 4 March 1674: "In the afternoon, I took a walk and brought my Karl along. I saw a very charming small house that the Marqués de Eliche has about a half an hour away from here. The building has been rather cleverly painted al fresco. The lower storey was painted by an itinerant [painter named] D. Dionisio N. – I am not alone in thinking it good. And the walls are all around painted by various masters, such as Carafa and others, who may be found here. He [Eliche] has an orchard nearby with various fruit trees."

paintings in the 1651 inventory, as compared to Don Luis's inventory of 1648. Furthermore, Don Gaspar was continually seeking to refine attributions, as may be inferred from the incomplete entries ("by the hand of --") scattered throughout the inventory. His roster of artists included the sort of lesser masters – Gabriel de Terrazas, for example – generally overlooked in Don Luis's inventory. There were many more Flemish works than in Don Luis's collection, and the subject matter was far more secular in character. Indeed, Don Gaspar's gallery was notably profane; only about 20 percent of the works had sacred subjects. In contrast, as has been noted above, the collection of the Conde de Monterrey, inventoried in 1653, contained nearly 56 percent religious pictures, by no means an extreme example.<sup>262</sup> Although we now know that secular subject matter was in fact common in noble mid-seventeenth-century Spanish galleries, Carpio's 1651 collection was highly unusual.

Certain paintings in the inventory have links to Don Gaspar's official duties. The presence of several works by Stanzione and Falcone recalls the canvases by these artists at the Buen Retiro and Alcázar. Similarly, a Tityus, attributed to Titian (Doc. 49, no. 162), recalls the torturati by Titian and Ribera in the collections of Monterrey and the king,<sup>263</sup> and the many battle scenes, still lifes, and landscapes in Don Gaspar's collection parallel the multitude of similar works at the Buen Retiro.<sup>264</sup> The entries describing works by Velázquez and Mazo also related to Don Gaspar's life at court. Contemporary documents indicate that Velázquez's duties as apostador mayor would have brought him into contact – and even potential conflict – with Don Gaspar whenever the royal family was in residence at the Buen Retiro,<sup>265</sup> and Mazo and Don Gaspar would have certainly become acquainted while both were serving in the retinue of Prince Balthasar Carlos.<sup>266</sup>

Several aspects of Don Gaspar's gallery of 1651 show him to be a collector of a different kind than his father. There were, for example, many copies, uncertain attributions, small sizes, and unknown or young artists; the subject matter of many of the works is likewise what we might expect to find in a "young" collection. Paintings with genre or "decorative" subjects were, of course, less expensive than monumental figured compositions, and a young collector's gallery might have included many such works. The type of subjects that served in a decorative capacity in Don Luis's collection now assumed greater importance in Don Gaspar's.

Don Gaspar's turbulent career at court after the death of his father in 1661 has little to do with the history of collecting, and is consequently outlined only in the entry for his documents, below. However, the Buen Retiro affair of 1662 and its aftermath, including exile, military service, and imprisonment in Portugal until 1668, had grave consequences for Don Gaspar's activities as a picture collector. In the first place, his actions might well have cost him his life and resulted in the dispersal of his (and his late father's) collection: a conviction of treason would have subjected Don Gaspar's entire estate, including the picture gallery, to seizure by the Crown. As it was, Don Gaspar's life and goods were spared, but it was to be six years before he could return to collecting. The following eight years at Madrid (1668–76) was a period of rebuilding: widowed in 1669, Don Gaspar remarried in 1671, to Doña Teresa Enríquez de Cabrera, daughter of the Almirante de Castilla.

As detailed in the entry to his documents, Don Gaspar possessed four principal residences, of which the Jardín de San Joaquín was probably the most important, and the main repository of the art collection; indeed, the density of the hanging scheme recorded in 1689 suggests a museum more than a home. (The model for Don Gaspar's jardín gallery may have been that of the Conde de Monterrey, which had come into the possession of Don Gaspar's brother by marriage.) Like a good museum curator, Don Gaspar also sought to refine his collection, including at least one public almoneda, described below.

Unfortunately, the lack of a death inventory for Don Luis makes it impossible to say how many of the works inventoried in 1689 but absent from the inventories of 1648, 1651, or the supposed list of 1661 were actually acquired by Don Gaspar. The documentary evidence is further confused because Don Gaspar sent many works back to Madrid from Italy before his death in 1687.<sup>267</sup> Nonetheless, it is certain that, by 1689, the Carpio collection was a star of the first magnitude in the constellation of seventeenth-century private holdings. The statistics are impressive: the collection contained more than 50 works attributed to Tintoretto, more than 30 each given to Titian and the Bassani, and more than 15 to Veronese. There are nearly 40 works attributed to Van Dyck, more than 25 given to Rubens, and nearly 20 related to Velázquez. Other artists represented by sizeable numbers of works are Leonardo da Vinci (five works – attributions obviously somewhat dubious), Raphael (five, plus one copy), Michelangelo (at least one), Andrea del Sarto (five), Correggio (six, plus two school pieces), Palma (14), Parmigianino (seven), Giulio Romano (at least four), Luca Cambiaso (14), Barocci (at least three), Sánchez Coello (16), El Greco (five), Caravaggio (three), the Carracci (at least three), Reni (9), Ribera (18), Orrente (four), and many lesser masters. Among Seicento artists, the names of Stanzione, Cerquozzi (“Michael Angel de la Batalla”), Reni and Ribera, Vaccaro, Van Laer, Codazzi, Artois, Rosa, Dughet, Mario dei Fiore, Falcone, Claude Lorraine, and Giordano stand out. There was even a portrait by Rembrandt (Doc. 115, no. 57). Excepting Velázquez, Mazo, and possibly Herrera the Younger (Doc. 115, no. 414), contemporary Spanish painters were conspicuously absent.

Don Gaspar de Haro in Italy

Don Gaspar left Madrid for Italy September 1676.<sup>268</sup> However, problems with the certification of his credentials, not to mention the many difficulties associated with travel and diplomacy in the seventeenth century, long delayed his arrival in Rome, which apparently occurred in March 1677.<sup>269</sup> Don Gaspar used his voyage as an opportunity to tour northern Italy, including Venice, where his admiration for the works of Tinto-

Don Gaspar apparently left Madrid sometime after 14 September 1676, was in Martorell, near Barcelona, on “5 October” 1676?, and arrived in Rome on “13 March” (f. 201 v.). Because the ms. refers to “difficulties” experienced by the former prime minister, Valenzuela, it is probable that Don Gaspar's voyage occurred during the winter of 1676–77, when Valenzuela's government fell. (A brief summary of Valenzuela's career may be found in Elliott 1963/70, p. 365.)

retto may have been strengthened. This admiration soon became a passion: Don Gaspar would eventually acquire, during his years in Italy, more than 170 pictures attributed to Tintoretto.

The record of Don Gaspar's early years in Rome remains partially confused,<sup>270</sup> but it seems clear that, in spite of initial difficulties, his ambassadorship was a peaceful, relatively successful interval in his life. Indeed, Don Gaspar's principal occupations in Rome were fighting off the machinations of hostile members of the Curia, intriguing for his return to Madrid, and collecting works of art.<sup>271</sup>

What is more, Don Gaspar became a leading patron of contemporary painters in Rome. Bellori, Pascoli, De Dominicis, and Pacichelli all lauded his taste, collection, and role as Maecenas in Rome and (later) in Naples.<sup>272</sup> The Oratorian priest, Sebastiano Resta, himself an important part of the Roman art world, spoke of a scuola platonica del Marchese del Carpio – a private academy or group of intellectuals meeting under Don Gaspar's protection.<sup>273</sup> (Indeed, Resta may have influenced Don Gaspar on several aesthetic issues, including the importance of Correggio – see the discussion in

270. Andrés 1975, p. 25, has Don Gaspar arrive in Rome on 13 March 1675, but then states that he immediately went to see Pope Innocent XI. However, Innocent XI did not become Pope until 21 September 1676; Clement X was still Pope in 1675. M.E.Ghelli, "Il vicerè marchese del Carpio (1688–1687)," Archivio storico per le province napoletane, 58 (1933), p. 286, assumes that Don Gaspar arrived in Rome in March 1677, which date is corroborated by the best reading of Biblioteca Nacional, Madrid, Sección de Manuscritos, ms. 18722-56, ff. 200–205. See the entry to the documents, below, for evidence of Pope Innocent XI's friendship with Don Gaspar.

271. Biblioteca Nacional, Madrid, Sección de Manuscritos, ms. 18722-56, ff. 201–202, gives a vivid picture of the intrigues surrounding Don Gaspar's first year in Rome. Don Gaspar's principal triumph at this time was securing papal protection for Spanish troops billeted in Rome en route from Milan and other centers to Sicily. His adversaries appear to have been Cardinal Cybo, the Pope's principal minister, and Cardinal Pio. For further details of Don Gaspar's ambassadorship, see Ghelli 1933, pp. 286–288 and notes, and Andrés 1975, pp. 25–28, neither of whom cite contemporary Italian sources. Don Gaspar's second wife, Doña Teresa, had remained in Madrid. Both Madame d'Aulnoy (cited by Andrés 1975, p. 27) and the Marquise de Villars (wife of the French Ambassador – see her Memoires de la cour d'Espagne 1679–1681, published by Morel-Fatio, Paris 1893, pp. 206–207, 226) recount Doña Teresa's pleas for her husband's return. Such a move was apparently opposed not only by the Queen Regent (now the Queen Mother), but also by the Almirante de Castilla (Doña Teresa's father) and many other courtiers. Villars – who never met Don Gaspar – mentions that Don Gaspar was respected for his "lively and enterprising spirit" (génie vif et entreprenant) but repeats the by now standard opinion that Don Gaspar was bizarre et dangereuse (p. 206). Bellori Le vite de' pittori, scultori et architetti moderni, 3 vols., Pisa 1821, 3, particularly pp. 66–67, reporting Luca Giordano's comment that Naples, upon Don Gaspar's death, "had lost a loving father, and the painters a great support, by reason of the great delight this wise Lord (mentovato Signore) took in the pictorial art." The career of Padre Resta is known chiefly through his surviving letters (e.g., Bottari-Ticozzi, vol. 2, pp. 100, 104–105; vol. 3, pp. 115–116 and 490–491 – cf. Haskell 1971, pp. 77 and 155.) According to Haskell 1971, p. 77, Vannugli (op. cit. above), and M. Dunn, "Father Sebastiano Resta and the Final Phase of the Decoration of S. Maria in Vallicella," The Art Bulletin, 64, no. 4 (1982), pp. 601–622. Padre Resta was an Oratorian, but the 1682 inventory, item 1275, contains a sketch for a bust of "Padre Resta du Geronimini" – apparently implying that Resta was a Jeronymite. Don Gaspar also owned a picture of St. Philip Neri (no. 1276) – a pendant to Padre Resta's portrait? – suggesting an Oratorian connection. More important than Resta's theological connections (at least in the context of Don Gaspar's collecting) were his aesthetics. Dunn 1982 outlines Resta's later career. Dunn notes (p. 603) that Correggio was Resta's favorite artist, which might explain – at least in part – Don Gaspar's passion for his work.

the entry to his documents, below.) Don Gaspar is also known to have retained at least one poet, Juan Vélez de León, as his secretary in Rome.<sup>274</sup>

As a patron, Don Gaspar became one of Maratti's chief supporters and is known to have expressed particular admiration for Bernini.<sup>275</sup> On at least one occasion, Don Gaspar visited the aged Bernini's studio, where he bought a self-portrait drawing – probably the Portrait of a Young Man with Drawings in his Hand, 1682 inventory (Doc. 109, no. 429).<sup>276</sup> According to Pascoli, Don Gaspar paid twice-weekly, three-times-weekly, and even “daily” (giornalmente) visits to the studios of Nicolò Berrettoni, Giuseppe Ghezzi, and Giovanni Francesco Grimaldi.<sup>277</sup> He “discovered” Paolo de Matteis,<sup>278</sup> and, in Bellori's perhaps overly dramatic account, gave Luca Giordano a torchlight tour of the pictures in the Palazzo della Spagna.<sup>279</sup> Even if we allow for exaggeration, it is clear that Don Gaspar not only made a tremendous impression on the contemporary Roman art world, but also made conspicuous efforts to befriend artists.

One of Don Gaspar's commissions during his stay in Rome is documented in some detail by Bellori. The passage, which concerns a drawing Maratti made for the Carpio collection, is worth close attention:

In this regard we must refer to a very fine drawing that Maratti made for the Marquis del Carpio at the time when he was the ambassador of the Catholic King that is, the King of Spain to the court of Pope Innocent XII. The Marquis was a great lover of painting. Besides statues, marbles, and pictures in large numbers he also collected a considerable number of drawings by the most famous painters of the past and of our times, handsomely displayed in thirty books. For some of these drawings he commissioned the most renowned masters then in Rome. The subject was to be painting, and each artist was left free to represent it in his own manner, as he chose.

[The passage continues with a description of Maratti's allegorical response.]<sup>280</sup>

Bellori's description is pertinent for several reasons. It provides further evidence that Don Gaspar did in fact commission as well as collect works of art from important artists in Seicento Rome. Also, it underscores Don Gaspar's interest in the graphic media, which was given the display deference of paintings.<sup>281</sup> Finally, it reveals a theoretical side to Don Gaspar's connoisseurship – in effect, Don Gaspar was asking the artists to express, nonverbally, the aesthetic principles that governed their work. We may assume that an analogous exchange of ideas often took place during the gatherings of Don Gaspar's scuola platonica. Finally, Maratti's drawing, which Bellori took nearly two pages to describe, suggests that Maratti was himself an important source of aesthetic theory in Don Gaspar's Rome.

274. For information, bibliography, and notes on Vélez de León, see Andrés 1975, pp. 28 and 46–47. Vélez de León is the best candidate for the writer of the “authorized biography” of Don Gaspar (published in Burke 1984, vol. 2, Document 4.6). He was the source of several pieces of propaganda issued in defense of Don Gaspar's career. As Andrés has noted, future biographical studies of Don Gaspar will require detailed research into Vélez de León's writings.

If this, and Maratti's artistic superiority, had not been enough to commend Maratti to Don Gaspar's personal attention, another fact would have: Maratti was also a collector, with exceptional holdings in many categories, but particularly in drawings.<sup>282</sup> It may, of course, be merely coincidental that Bellori connects Maratti with Don Gaspar's 30 volumes of bound drawings, but it is equally possible that Maratti's collection served as a prototype for Don Gaspar's.

The inventory that Don Gaspar took in Rome upon his promotion to the Viceroyalty of Naples in 1682 (Doc. 109) illuminates his activities both as a diplomat and as a patron. For example, Bellori's characterization of Maratti as Don Gaspar's "favorite artist" is corroborated by 18 items attributed to him.<sup>283</sup> One of these (no. 373) describes a copy after Titian's Virgin in Glory with SS. Francis and Nicholas, which is given the relatively high evaluation of 150 scudi. Even if this picture was not a direct commission, it represents Don Gaspar's support of an important aspect of Maratti's artistic development.<sup>284</sup> Berrettoni, who was associated with Maratti, contributed three works entirely by his own hand, including a Portrait of Poussin (no. 521), and another four which were hung as a set in collaboration with Abraham Brueghel. Grimaldi ("Giovanni Francesco Bolognese"; 1606–1680), who was nearly sixty-nine years old when Don Gaspar arrived in Rome, is represented by four works, including two landscapes that Don Gaspar hung together with a pair by Codazzi (nos. 789, 790). The inventory also lists a work by Grimaldi's son, Alessandro, who had died before his father (no. 1004), and by Grimaldi's son-in-law, Pietro Santo Bartoli (no. 153 – a copy after Raphael; cf. the Escorial list, f. 15). Paolo Cattamara ("Paoluccio Napoletano") is represented by four large still-life compositions (nos. 193, 742).

Foremost among the many contemporary artists who figured prominently in Don Gaspar's collection was Pasquale de' Rossi (1641–1725), a Venetian artist who came to Rome around the time of Don Gaspar's own arrival.<sup>285</sup> No less than 41 large-scale figurative compositions by Rossi hung in the Carpio gallery in Rome; these included 282. See J.K. and R.H. Westin, Carlo Maratta ... Figurative Drawings, State College, PA 1975, pp. 7–11, for a discussion of Maratta's collection of drawings. As the Westins note, pp. 8–9, Maratta's works were very closely held, and were shown only to selected visitors. The collection was eventually bought in part by Philip V and Isabel Farnese.

283. See Haskell 1971, p. 191, and Bellori 1942, pp. 117 and 121.

284. According to Wethey 1969, vol. 1, p. 110, a copy by Maratta after Titian of this same subject was sold to Spain with other paintings from the collection of the recently deceased Maratta. The 1746 inventory taken at La Granja records the piece with the relatively small dimensions of  $\frac{1}{2}$  vara 3 dedos by  $\frac{1}{2}$  vara 2 dedos – unverifiable, since the work is now lost. Unfortunately, Don Gaspar's Roman inventory assigns item 373 the unlikely dimensions, 20 x 5 palmi, making any identification difficult. It should also be noted that Don Gaspar had employed artists to paint copies of famous paintings on the walls of his villa in Madrid, as discussed in the text, above.

285. Rossi was born in Vicenza and trained in Venice; see U. Thieme and F. Becker, Allgemeines Lexikon der bildenden Künstler von der Antike bis zur Gegenwart, 37 vols., Leipzig 1907–50, 29, 1935, citing earlier bibliography, and Wittkower 1973, pp. 323 and 383, note 104.

religious subjects, mythological scenes, decorative pictures with themes like “The Four Seasons,” and miscellaneous pieces (e.g., Two Women, no. 970). Don Gaspar’s enthusiasm for Rossi’s work did not extend to matters of price, however: Maratti’s paintings were evaluated at four to eight times the price of a canvas of equivalent size by Rossi.

Don Gaspar also acquired works by Sassoferrato (three works); Giovanni Bonati (two); Francesco Cozza (one); Pietro Santo Bartoli (two, plus a copy after Raphael); Baciccio (one); Ciro Ferri (two); the landscape artists Angeluccio (two) and Lauri (one, plus four with other artists); and the still-life painter Gavarotti (six), a pupil of the recently deceased Mario Nuzzi (“Mario dei Fiore,” 1603–73). Luca Giordano had already sold 11 works to Don Gaspar by 1682; he led a contingent of living Neapolitan artists that included his pupil, Tommaso Giaquinto (“Giaquinto Cicaliano” (d. 1717) one picture); the already mentioned de Matteis; and Cavaliere Giuseppe Recco (1634–1695), who would eventually die en route to Madrid, where he was expected to take a position as court painter.<sup>286</sup>

A survey of the pictures in Don Gaspar’s gallery in 1682 would have shown points of both similarity to and divergence from the canon of taste in seventeenth-century Spanish connoisseurship. The summary of the 1682 inventory lists more than 320 Venetian pictures.<sup>287</sup> But these numbers are misleading, for nearly half of the Venetian works – 153 pieces – were attributed to Tintoretto or his school. To these may be added 16 attributions to Tintoretto in the Escorial shipping lists, two in the 1687 inventory, and 54 more already in the Carpio collection in Madrid – not to mention a volume of drawings. Don Gaspar thus transformed Spanish love of Venetian painting into an idiosyncratic passion for a single artist’s works. (It is, of course, impossible to determine how many of the pieces attributed to Tintoretto were actually by his hand – Pinacci set low evaluations on most of the works. Even so, the acquisition of more than 150 works by a single artist in less than seven years was an extraordinary feat – it represented the purchase of a Tintoretto canvas approximately every other week. Don Gaspar must have bought every canvas attributed to Tintoretto that came onto the Roman art market during his tenure as ambassador.)

Otherwise Don Gaspar’s collection showed a remarkably balanced and detailed knowledge of the Italian school. Although a quick survey of his Cinquecento acquisitions suggests a concentration of interest in the usual famous names (Titian, Veronese, Correggio, Raphael, and Parmigianino) who had impressed Don Luis, Don Gaspar’s Venetian pictures also included works attributed to the Bellini, Giorgione, Paris Bordone, the Palma family, Schiavone, and Bassano. (Compared to other Spanish Golden Age collections, Don Gaspar’s gallery had only a modest contingent of works by the Bassani: eight.) More than twenty different Venetian artists were represented in all. Nor was the rest of the Cinquecento overlooked: there was a respectable smattering of Central Italian High Renaissance names, and among the forty-odd Mannerist pieces were works attributed to Giulio Romano, Beccafumi, Perino del Vaga, and Daniele da Volterra. The large Venetian contingent was augmented by nearly 60 sixteenth-century northern Italian works, including examples by the followers of Leonardo, Correggio and his circle, Dossi, Lotto, Scarsellino, and others. The presence of token examples of the work of Giotto and Cimabue has already been noted, but in fact Don Gaspar’s historicism went far beyond the Renaissance. An important aspect of his Roman collection – unfortunately, one just outside the scope of this study – was a large assemblage of antiquities, which Don Gaspar hoped to ship back to Spain.

Perhaps the most remarkable aspect of Don Gaspar's Cinquecento collection was the large number of works by late mannerists. At least 77 pictures were attributed to artists from this group, including Barocci (twelve works), Cambiaso (four), Giulio Campi (one), Bernardino Campi (one), unknown Campi (one), Cigoli (two), the Zuccari (16), Pulzone (nine), Santi di Tito (one), and Muziano (five). To some extent, these pieces represented a Spanish bias in Don Gaspar's taste. As is well known, Zuccaro and other so-called "reformers" were among the artists called to the Escorial in the 1580s, and the reform style found numerous adherents in Spain well into the 1620s. Since the Spanish School was in a sense founded on reform principles, a Spanish collector might reasonably have been expected to seek out this kind of art. But, as in the case of Tintoretto, Don Gaspar's enthusiasm went well beyond a casual interest; he collected almost all the painters we would today consider among the most significant reformers. Given Don Gaspar's concurrent interest in Bolognese art of the seventeenth century, his collection of such works suggests a certain amount of historical curiosity.

Impressive as they were, Don Gaspar's sixteenth-century pictures constituted less than half of his collection. More numerous were the Seicento works, including those by the contemporary artists already discussed. In particular, Don Gaspar cultivated an appreciation for the cornerstone of Italian seventeenth-century painting: the School of Bologna. More than 140 of the works inventoried in 1682 were said to be by Bolognese artists, and another 69 were given to by Roman artists associated in some way with the Bolognese. Forty-one works bore the names of the Carracci themselves. The principal emphasis fell on Annibale and Agostino Carracci and their classicizing successors: 108 lots were attributed to these artists. But another 32 lots were given to Ludovico Carracci and those of his successors who worked in the fully Baroque style.

Indeed, a sense of historical balance – of attempting to collect the entire school rather than focusing on one particular stylistic trend – pervaded the collection. Hence, the works of Baroque artists such as Lanfranco and Cortona were present – if fewer in number – to offset the more classical works of Domenichino, Albani, Poussin, and Sacchi. Furthermore, Don Gaspar sought to collect seventeenth-century Italian painting in extraordinary depth and range: the more than 22 Bolognese artists represented were joined by five tenebrists, over 40 other Roman masters, 14 Neapolitans, two Spaniards, and a large group of northern artists active in Italy. Ultimately, the best word to describe Don Gaspar's collection would be "eclectic."

Don Gaspar's interest in the visual arts during his viceroyalty in Naples, 1682–87, also continued in spite of many preoccupations. For example, he obtained two new works from Giordano, along with a copy by Giordano after Correggio and 27 workshop pieces retouched by the master. This corroborates Bellori's account of Don Gaspar's continuing patronage of Giordano in Naples.<sup>288</sup> New artists, such as Giacomo del Pò, also appear on Don Gaspar's roster; Giacomo's daughter Teresa del Pò would subsequently engrave some of Don Gaspar's masterpieces. In all, the Escorial shipping list and 1687 inventory add 20 to 24 new names to those already present in Don Gaspar's Roman inventory. Nor was the flow of acquisitions much abated during his viceroyalty: more than 600 works entered his collection in Naples. But the peripheral activities – for example, attribution and conservation – seem to have declined markedly. The new pictures were by no means completely catalogued at the time of Don Gaspar's death.

One further aspect of Don Gaspar's collecting and patronage remains to be discussed: his interest in the works of women artists. The Carpio inventories of 1682 and 1687 include works attributed to Sofonisba Anguissola (nos. 666 and 980); Irene di Spilimberga, a follower of Titian (no. 726); Marietta Tintoretto (nos. 660–61); Domenica Macagna, a flower painter (nos. 775–76); Elisabetta Sirani (no. 801); and Teresa del Pò (Escorial List, f. 20). We do not know, of course, Don Gaspar's motives may have had for acquiring these works – perhaps he cast his nets so widely that the women were brought in with the rest. But, as has already been noted above, Don Gaspar (or at least, Pinacci) was also aware of details in the biographies of these women, indicating a more than circumstantial interest. Furthermore, he seems to have begun to use Teresa del Pò – working, to be sure, from drawings by her father – to publicize his collection.

Much work remains to be done in identifying extant pieces from Don Gaspar's Italian acquisitions.<sup>289</sup> However, a few examples may be cited to give an indication of the quality to be found among Don Gaspar's acquisitions: Raphael's Alba Madonna (1687 no. 1256 – now National Gallery, Washington, no. 24); Correggio's Madonna del Latte (now Szépművészeti Múzeum, Budapest), which seems to be the same as item no. 1134 in Don Gaspar's 1682 inventory, from the Orsini gallery; and a second Correggio, a Madonna and Child with the Young St. John, now in the Prado (no. 112, identification tentative, Fig. 27). His Seicento works included masterpieces such as Giordano's The Genius of Rubens (Prado 190), along with the pictures by Velázquez already cited. The attribution of several of Don Gaspar's pictures is doubted by modern scholars: for example, the Weeping Magdalene, attributed to Titian at 1682, no. 511, now found in the collection of the Duke of Portland, Welbeck Abbey, is called a copy (after the original in the Pitti Palace, Florence) rather than a study, as Pinacci's entry suggests.

Don Gaspar died in Naples on 16 November 1687; as with so many noble collections, sales were ordered by his heirs in Naples and in Madrid, with the Naples venue requiring correspondence between Madrid and agents in the viceroyalty. Given the size of the collection and the complexity of international communication, it is not surprising that it took seven years to settle the estate, as detailed in the entry below. The range of social classes represented by the purchasers at the sale is extraordinary, ranging from the king to a gardener. Most of these were creditors of the estate who were willing to accept pictures in lieu of cash payments.

Artist Advisors to Don Gaspar de Haro

The role of the Sienese artist Giuseppe Pinacci (1642–1718) in Don Gaspar's collecting is worth noting. Pinacci, like Nardi (and to some extent, Velázquez), had what was in effect a second career as an art historian and connoisseur. His knowledge of art history, much of which is revealed in the entries of the 1682 inventory, was quite detailed and must of been of great service to Don Gaspar as he assembled his collection.

289. Harris 1983, p. 412, note 15, cited only seven extant works known to have borne Don Gaspar's monogram. Since then, many more have come to light in auction houses, museums, etc.

Indeed, throughout this study, seventeenth-century Spanish (and expatriate Italian) artists are encountered in the roles of connoisseurs, art historians, dealers, and advisors. Spanish collectors valued their expertise, as may be inferred from Don Luis de Haro's concerns over Velázquez's pronouncements on the paintings that Haro wished to give to the king. Furthermore, every evaluation relied on the testimony of an artist for historical and legal respectability. In Italy, where artists had better access to Renaissance sources and documents, there was also a literary tradition on which to rely. Pinacci's professional connoisseurship was a logical extension of his career as an educated artist, although in fact Italian artists were not normally involved in the inventory process to the extent found in Spain.

Of course, Pinacci was not working in an intellectual vacuum: we may assume that Resta, Bellori, perhaps Maratti, various dealers and connoisseurs, and Don Gaspar himself all provided attributions. Thus, Bellori's ideas may have been the basis for Pinacci's observations, in the inventory, on the Carracci and their followers; furthermore, Resta, who contributed several works to the collection, may have taken a particularly active role in advising Pinacci.

Whether with help or not, Pinacci provided a remarkably informed account of Don Gaspar's pictures. We have already noted, for example, his knowledge of the biographies of women artists: the inventory of 1682 cites Sofonisba Anguissola's study with Campi (666), gives a thumbnail biography of the Milanese still-life specialist, Domenica Macagna (775), and seems to distinguish between Elisabetta Sirani and her father ("la Sirana" vs. "il Sirano" nos. 561, 712, and 801). Faced with many over-optimistic attributions on Don Gaspar's purchases, Pinacci and the notary, Redoutey, qualified the attributions by means of the prices they set on each object, so that if one of Don Gaspar's many works "by" Tintoretto appears with a value of 15–50 scudi, versus 400 and up for other works, we may assume that the appraisal is a way of questioning the attribution (see nos. 135, 140, 144, versus no. 328). On the other hand, high evaluations on a work only "thought to be by the hand of" Veronese (no. 442), or which "they say is by the hand of Titian" (no. 515), probably indicates that Pinacci had reason to accept the attribution. In general, following Pinacci's prices, we may come to the conclusion that Don Gaspar's contemporaries considered only about one picture in six was considered to be of truly high quality, although many of those thought to be of less value at the time (such as portraits by Velázquez) would be considered immensely valuable today. (See the discussion in the entry to the document.)

To return to the question of other artistic advisors, we should note the significant parallel between the taste for Seicento art exhibited in Don Gaspar's collection and the aesthetics of his principal painter in Rome: Carlo Maratti. Maratti is often characterized as the classicizing successor to Domenichino, Poussin, and Sacchi, who was Maratti's teacher, and it is true that Maratti's works provided a bridge from the earlier seventeenth-century classicizing artists to those who would lay the foundations of eighteenth-century Neoclassicism. On the other hand, as Wittkower and others have noted, Maratti's art was heavily influenced by High Baroque style:

Maratti had gone some way towards a reconciliation of the two opposing trends, the Baroque and the classical. In every sense he steered an agreeable middle course.... Somewhat paradoxically, it was his pragmatic approach by virtue of which he came up to the hybrid theoretical expectations of his friend Bellori.<sup>290</sup>

290. Wittkower 1973, p. 221; see also Enggass's similar comments in Enggass and Brown 1970, pp. 136–137.

As if to match the “hybrid” style of his chief painter Don Gaspar also found an agreeable middle course for his connoisseurship. Just as Maratti’s art eventually gravitated more to the classicizing pole of seventeenth-century styles, so did Don Gaspar’s collection tend to emphasize Annibale over Ludovico Carracci, the Bolognese classicists over Cortona and Lanfranco, and Maratti himself over Baciccio. Thus we may say that, during his Roman years, Don Gaspar’s patronage of living artists and his taste for earlier art were in accord. The old and the new complemented each other on the walls of his gallery.

If Don Gaspar’s connoisseurship showed an affinity for the artistic values championed by Bellori, it is reasonable to ask if the famous writer was in any way responsible for forming Don Gaspar’s taste. On the surface, it would appear that Bellori’s principles had been adopted by Don Gaspar. The first edition of Bellori’s Vite appeared in 1672, and his treatise on the “Idea of Beauty,” which forms the introduction of that work, had been read before the Academy of St. Luke in Rome in 1664, long before Don Gaspar came to Rome.<sup>291</sup> Certainly Don Gaspar’s enthusiasm for the Bolognese School would have found support from Bellori. (Indeed, Bellori was willing to overlook the Baroque tendencies in an artist like Lanfranco, if that artist had the imprimatur of training in the tradition of the Carracci.)<sup>292</sup> We may assume that, without Bellori’s influence, Don Gaspar would probably not have acquired so many Bolognese works. Furthermore, like Maratti, Bellori was himself a collector, at once in competition with and serving as a model for Don Gaspar.<sup>293</sup>

On the other hand, there is considerable evidence that more than Bellori’s influence was involved in the formation of Don Gaspar’s mature taste. For example, we know that Padre Resta was a devoté of Correggio, that he donated paintings to the Carpio collection, and that, by his own account, he participated, along with Pinacci, in the Ambassador’s scuola platonica. Similarly, Maratti’s drawings (we have surmised) might have inspired Don Gaspar to assemble his own collection of drawings. Furthermore, the inventory of 1682 is evidence in itself of Pinacci’s expertise, and therefore of his probable influence, although the large numbers of low evaluations might indicate that he was consulted only after the fact. Finally, many details of the collection fail to correspond to Bellori’s theories. For example, it is hard to believe that Bellori would have welcomed the acquisition of works by Pieter van Laer and his followers or seconded Don Gaspar’s relatively high regard for still lifes.

In this context, it would be useful to recall the collection that may be assumed to have had the greatest influence of all over Don Gaspar’s connoisseurship: the royal holdings in Madrid. For King Philip’s collections were similarly eclectic, and nowhere more so than at the Buen Retiro. There Domenichino and Lanfranco’s works hung together as part of a common decorative scheme, with little apparent regard for what

292. Bellori 1821, vol. 2, pp. 103–123 (Life of Lanfranco) – partially translated in Enggass and Brown 1970, pp. 92–96. Bellori has the following to say concerning Lanfranco’s commission in Sant’ Andrea della Valle, in Rome: [Lanfranco receives the dome commission] ... “This caused great bitterness in Domenichino, who lamented it in vain, since at one time he had the commission for all the frescoes.... But this change did not bring such damage in art that it did not still remain glorious. For in propounding so great a rivalry Lanfranco left to posterity an admirable example of his great genius. Up to this day this manner has occupied and now holds first place. The highest praise is due anyone able to equal him.” (Enggass and Brown 1970, p. 93)

293. Enggass, in Enggass and Brown 1970, p. 6, provides a convenient, brief description of Bellori’s collection.

we today think of as a clash in styles.<sup>294</sup> Many of the men responsible for assembling the Buen Retiro's gallery – for example, the elder Monterrey, Leganés, and ultimately, Olivares – were related to Don Gaspar, and he spent his formative years supervising the Retiro household.

Don Gaspar's Roman collection reflected the influence of Spanish connoisseurship in other ways as well. Here the basis of Don Gaspar's connoisseurship was in keeping with the values of other Spanish collectors even if his interest in Italian culture and subsequent development of a representative collection of Italian art surpassed theirs. It might even be argued that early seventeenth-century Spanish aesthetics – particularly the writings of Pacheco – anticipate Bellori on several points, including a catholic acceptance of what seem to us to be varied styles of art.<sup>295</sup>

The fact is that Don Gaspar had arrived in Rome a seasoned connoisseur, who had already assembled one collection of his own, inherited and greatly augmented a highly important second collection (that of his father), and managed a third (the Buen Retiro). As his dedicated acquisition of works by Tintoretto demonstrated, he knew what he liked and was willing to divert significant resources to obtaining it. Nor was Don Gaspar willing to be stampeded into wholesale purchase of objects that did not appeal to him, as in the case of the Massimi collection, from which he obtained only choice antiquities and a handful of paintings.<sup>296</sup> In short, if Bellori induced Don Gaspar to buy Bolognese art, it was because Bolognese painting fit into the latter's own developed aesthetic.

The very size of Don Gaspar's holdings – whether taken as a whole or understood in terms of large blocks of works attributed to single artists, such as Tintoretto – must overwhelm all other considerations. But the details are also significant. Don Gaspar was an important patron and collector of Velázquez, Colonna, Mitelli, and other artists in Spain, and of Maratti, and Giordano – not to mention many lesser masters – in Italy. He offered Velázquez an opportunity to paint unusual subjects, such as the Rokeby Venus, one of the rare nudes in Spanish Golden Age art. He commissioned works in Rome that not only were of interest in their own right but also inspired the artists to express an aesthetic philosophy, as in the case of the drawings mentioned by Bellori. He was an important point of contact for Italian artists such as Recco and Giordano who would eventually seek to come to Spain in the last years of Charles II's

294. The decoration of the Retiro is described in detail by von Barghahn 1979, passim. See especially her Chapter 4, "The Paintings are Collected." The subject is developed further by Brown and Elliott 1980, pp. 114–132, who take the position that it was ultimately Philip's taste which governed the decoration of the Palace (as indeed, all seventeenth-century collecting in Spain).

295. See Pacheco 1956, vol. 1, pp. 237–275 and 475ff. In my master's thesis, "Diego Velázquez and Religious Genre Painting," New York University Institute of Fine Arts 1973, pp. 24–45, I note several aspects of Pacheco's thought that anticipate what Panofsky has called Bellori's "Turn to Normative Aesthetics." See Panofsky 1968, p. 109; on Pacheco, see Panofsky's p. 217, notes 67–68; p. 219, note 74; and p. 225, note 28. Panofsky considered Pacheco to have been a Scholastic/Platonic thinker, but as Brown (1978, pp. 51–54) has noted, Pacheco's treatise is extremely heterogenous and relies at times on extended pastiches of the works of previous writers. Brown stresses the difficulty of forcing Pacheco's thought into any one mold. Another way to put this would be to call Pacheco's aesthetics "eclectic." Just as Don Gaspar collected works in various styles, Pacheco was able to cite Michelangelo, Raphael, Dürer, Titian, and Correggio in one breath, as a collective example of successful art (Pacheco 1956, vol. 1, p. 476).

296. Of the Massimi collection works listed by Orbaan 1920, only nos. 58 and 106 (Velázquez – Carpio 1682, nos. 430 and 429), possibly 48 (Annibale Carracci, St. John the Baptist – cf. similar subject by Ludovico, 1682 item 812), 80 (Annibale Carracci, Portrait – cf. 1682 item 1038, Self-Portrait), and 81–84 (four small landscapes by "Goffredo" – cf. 1682 nos. 4308, 4339, but identification uncertain) offer any possibility of having been among Don Gaspar's pictures, unless such difficult-to-specify works as landscapes by Gaspar Dughet were also purchased.

reign.<sup>297</sup> He understood the connection, as did Bellori, between the art of the past and that of his own time, and he made his gallery – not to mention his pocketbook – available to artists. He also seems to have participated in the positive re-evaluation of still-life and genre subjects in the later seventeenth century.

The Almirantes de Castilla

Of the many large noble collections in seventeenth-century Madrid, that of the Almirantes de Castilla seems to have captured the particular attention of contemporaries. Carducho praised it, Hopton (as we have seen) mentioned it first on his brief list of galleries,<sup>298</sup> the Duke of Gramont visited it, and the Imperial Ambassador, Harrach, devoted several pages to it in his diary of 1674.<sup>299</sup> Palomino continued to celebrate the collection in the eighteenth century,<sup>300</sup> and both Ponz and Cruz Bahamonde cited it in their writings.<sup>301</sup>

The core of the collection was assembled in the first half of the reign of Philip IV by Don Juan Alfonso Enríquez de Cabrera, the ninth almirante. Don Juan Alfonso was born in 1597 but was orphaned at the age of three; he thus came into possession of his estates in 1600. He served as Mayordomo Mayor to Philip IV and was appointed Viceroy of Sicily in 1641. He was Viceroy of Naples from 1644 to 1646, and temporary ambassador to Rome in 1646. While in Rome he resided at the Palazzo Colonna, as his mother was Vittoria Colonna, daughter of Marcantonio II (“Il Grande”) and Felice Orsini. He also inherited paintings from his mother (see Doc. 18). Juan Alfonso died in Madrid in 1647.<sup>302</sup>

As Almirante de Castilla, Don Juan Alfonso also held several other noble titles, foremost among which was that of Duque de Medina de Rioseco. In all, Don Juan Alfonso was lord over more than 100 towns and villages and patron of almost as many churches.<sup>303</sup> However, the estates of the almirante had been burdened with enormous debts since the late sixteenth century – the total owed amounted to 764,226 ducats by 1610 – and the family had to ask for royal grants to keep solvent at several points in the seventeenth century.<sup>304</sup> At the time of the last almirante's treason and flight to Portugal in 1702, the estate still owed more than 275,000 ducats.<sup>305</sup> Of course, as Kamen makes clear, these debts did not stop the almirantes from maintaining an impressively luxurious standard of living, as in the case of the “Persian Banquet” that Don Juan Alfonso's son, Don Juan Gaspar, gave for the Duc de Gramont in 1659.<sup>306</sup> Their mortgaged estates also seem not to have hindered the search for masterpieces by the two almirantes.

297. According to Pascoli 1730 (vol. 1), p. 186, and 1736 (vol. 2), p. 314, Don Gaspar also sought to persuade Berrettoni and Giacinto Calandrucci to go to Spain. Cf. Haskell 1971, p. 192.

Don Juan Alfonso's pictures were appraised on 7 August 1647 by Antonio Arias, a painter (see the Documents). This inventory has long been available to scholars, thanks to the circumstances surrounding the treason of the last almirante in 1702. At that time, a copy of the 1647 tasación was appended to the sequestration proceedings against the last almirante's estate. Apparently, many of the pictures had been entailed, and in spite of mandated sales in 1691, the collection was largely intact.<sup>307</sup> The 1647 inventory suggests that Don Juan Alfonso had been especially active during his viceroyalty, purchasing large numbers of contemporary Italian works as well as choice older masterpieces. Some of the earlier works, however, must have been acquired in Madrid before the almirante left for Sicily and Naples.

The almirante's 1647 gallery showed the same eclectic spirit that marked the king's collection. Don Juan Alfonso was especially catholic in his sampling of Seicento Italian art, with examples from the schools of Bologna (Carracci, Reni, Guercino), Rome (Cavaliere d'Arpino, Cortona, Domenichino, Poussin), and, of course, Naples (Ribera, Stanzione, Novelli). The almirante seems to have made an attempt to collect all the popular High Renaissance masters, including – if it was an original – a very rare piece by Michelangelo.<sup>308</sup> Venetian art of the Cinquecento also held an important position – there were twenty works attributed to Titian, along with others attributed to Tintoretto, Bellini, and the Bassani. There were traces of interest in Mannerism (works by Bronzino, Salviati, Polidoro, and Perino del Vaga), and an adequate representation of northern European art of the sixteenth century (Bril, Brueghel, Dürer, and Paul de Vos). Seventeenth-century northern masters were also collected (Rubens, Van Dyck, and Snyders).

A few areas of specialization may be discerned in the almirante's collecting. As might be expected, Italian works outnumbered northern European examples, and Neapolitan masters predominated among contemporary artists. The names of at least two Sicilian artists, Pietro Novelli and Andrea Sabatini (Andrea da Salerno), are evidence that the almirante sought to patronize local artists under his rule. On the basis of numbers alone, it may be assumed that Ribera was the almirante's favorite contemporary master. Among the old masters, works by Titian and the Bassani were the most numerous, followed somewhat distantly by Raphael (20, 16, and five works, respectively, not including copies). There also seems to have been a rough parallel between many of the artists represented in the almirante's gallery in 1647 (Codazzi, Falcone, Stanzione, Scipione Compagno and "Poussin") and those which had been collected for the Buen Retiro. This may have been a coincidence, but it indicates that the almirante had arrived in Italy already knowing which artists to seek out.

One final aspect of the 1647 inventory may be noted. At the end of the list of paintings is a group of empty frames that once contained pictures given by Don Juan Alfonso to Philip IV. Among these pictures were works by Veronese, Bassano, Ribera, Rubens, the still life painter Luca Forte and a number of unidentified masters. The prices of the frames are of particular interest: they vary from 200 to 3,000 reales, or as much as was given to a large multi-figured composition. Obviously, the pictures that hung in such expensive frames must have been of some importance, and it is a pity that only a few of the works are attributed in the inventory. Furthermore, the prices provide a benchmark against which to judge the evaluations of the other pictures in the collection. Thus, a painting attributed to Bellini but evaluated at only 350 reales, or another attributed to Titian at 250, or yet another given to Leonardo da Vinci at 250, or a number of portraits attributed to Titian at 80–132 reales, suggest that the evaluator, Arias, was less than convinced by many of the attributions. This is made explicit at item 92, “a small picture of St. Roch, which they say is by the hand of Titian but is not ... 50 reales.”

308. This was, according to visitors, the showpiece of the collection – see, for example, the Ambassador Harrach's account: [16 May 1674] "Vormittag bin ich zu Haus geblieben, nachmittag in des Almirante ... Was ich gar absonderlich beobachtet ist, dass er ein Stück von MICHAEL ANGELO BUONAROTA hat, welches er sehr estimirt, indeme dieser Mahler das meiste nur al fresco auf die Mauer gemahlt; einen gar kleines contrafait eines Cardinal von Titian, auf welche Weis er nit pfeget zu mahlen." (From the diary of the Graf Ferdinand Harrach, Imperial Ambassador to Madrid; dated in Madrid 16 May 1674 – published in Harrach, Ferdinand B., Graf, Tagebuch ... 1673–74, F. Mencik, ed., Vienna 1913, p. 91.)

Note also that Don Juan Alfonso's wife, Doña Luisa de Sandoval, possessed a collection of nearly 200 pictures in her own right.<sup>309</sup> Many of these came from – or at least, were framed in – Naples; others were attributed to Michelangelo, Raphael, Ribera, Guercino, and possibly Reni. One of the works, a St. Sebastian by Ribera (2 ½ varas high) was probably the “large” picture of the same subject attributed to Ribera at item 384 in 1647. The works attributed to Guercino and Michelangelo, however, do not seem to appear in the husband's collection.

References to the collection of the almirantes from 1647–1702 suggest, that the collection continued to be refined after Don Juan Alfonso's death, and, that it continued to be accessible to at least a limited public. Unfortunately, the absence of attributions in Claudio Coello's 1691 evaluation of Don Juan Gaspar's estate<sup>310</sup> makes it difficult to be certain how many of the ninth almirante's works were preserved in the collection of his successor, although the indices to this volume suggest that most of the pieces carried over. Similarly, we cannot be sure that the collection was truly accessible, but this is strongly implied in the literary references as well as in the existence of copies made after works in the collection.<sup>311</sup>

Don Juan Gaspar (the tenth almirante, 1625–91) was an important cultural figure in his own right. He founded the Franciscan convent and church of San Pascual Bailón in Madrid, which he decorated with five paintings by Ribera along with other important Italian and Flemish works.<sup>312</sup> The Riberas include an Immaculate Conception (on the high altar), a St. Andrew, a St. Paul the Hermit, a Baptism of Christ, and a Martyrdom of St. Sebastian. The Immaculate Conception, one of the jewels of his father's collection (no. 434) is most likely the signed canvas now in the Prado, Madrid; the St. Sebastian, probably the painting already mentioned in the collections of both Don Juan Alfonso and Doña Luisa, was possibly in the Kaiser Friedrich Museum, Berlin (now destroyed); the St. Andrew was also in Don Juan Alfonso's collection (no. 630) now in the Szépművészeti Múzeum in Budapest, and the St. Paul is possibly Musée de Louvre, Paris (1647 inv. 385, RF 125). The Baptism, now in the Musée des Beaux-Arts, Nancy, seems to have been acquired by Don Juan Gaspar. Among other pictures that the tenth almirante gave to the church were Titian's St. Peter Enthroned, Adored by Alexander VI and Jacopo Pesaro, now in the Musée Royal des Beaux-Arts,

We also know that Juan Alfonso acquired pictures at certain sales: a work by Por-denone from the English Commonwealth sale via the Conde de Fuensaldaña,<sup>313</sup> two pictures by Codazzi in the Morelli sale of 1670,<sup>314</sup> pictures attributed to Veronese, "Burdone," and Titian – as well as some unattributed works – from the almoneda of Don Antonio Messia de Tovar, Conde de Molina in 1675, and other unattributed pictures from the almoneda of Don Alonso Ramírez de Prado in 1674.<sup>315</sup>

Don Juan Gaspar's collection seemingly offers a contrast with those of his father's generation in that it demonstrates an interest in Spanish artists. Except for Ribera, who was almost Italian, only two Spanish pictures (still lifes by Pereda) are mentioned in the 1647 inventory. Don Juan Gaspar, however, dedicated a room in his collection to the native school, the so-called "Pieza de Españoles". Interestingly, separate rooms were given over to the works of the Italianate artists Ribera and Orrente. Using information provided by Palomino, we know that the "Pieza de Españoles" contained works by Carreño, Herrera the younger, Antonio Pereda, and Antolínez.

Palomino also says that Don Juan Gaspar was a patron and even a friend to the painter Juan de Alfaro, who died in 1680.<sup>316</sup> As the documents from other collections of the later seventeenth century suggest, Madrid collectors took a new interest in the Spanish national school during the reign of Charles II. Although this surely reflects in part Spain's diminished role in European affairs, the increase in local patronage may help explain the resurgence of Spanish art in an era otherwise distinguished by decadence and decline.<sup>317</sup> Don Juan Gaspar's reputation as a Maecenas was matched by his achievements in other areas. He was a poet, a skilled horseman, successful politician, and an authority on bullfighting.<sup>318</sup>

If the inventory of 1647 is any indication, Don Juan Alfonso had arranged his pictures with little sense of an historical sequence. Don Juan Gaspar, on the other hand, re-arranged the gallery according to attributions naming the rooms after the artists whose pieces dominated each hanging scheme or (less often) by category of subject. Thus, while some of the rooms in the palace bore names derived from family circumstance – such as the Pieza del Ayo, which was probably named for Don Juan Gaspar's tutor, Don Tomás Tamayo de Vargas, a celebrated literatus<sup>319</sup> – other rooms were dedicated to Titian, Bassano, Rubens, Tintoretto, Raphael, Ribera, and Orrente.

As we have mentioned, Harrach, writing in 1674, was not impressed with the architecture of the palace, which was located on the Prado de San Gerónimo, but he felt that the pictures could be compared with the best examples in Vienna or Brussels.

It is probable that the family's debts, along with the sequestration proceedings following the flight of the last almirante in 1702, had caused the dispersal of the picture collection by the mid-eighteenth century. The sale of pictures in 1691 has already been mentioned, although there seems to be no preparation for such a sale in the 1691 inventory documents. Eventually, the almirante's estates – or rather, those of the duchy of Medina de Rioseco – were incorporated into the houses of Benavente and Osuna.

The Later History of the Benavente Collection

The Benaventes would continue to be as prominent politically in the reigns of Philip IV and Charles II as they had been under Philip III, and they continued to develop their collection. Carducho cites the collection of a Conde de Benavente and his father, although it is not clear which two of three possible counts are being mentioned.<sup>320</sup> At the death of the tenth Conde-Duque, Don Juan Alonso de Pimentel y Ponce de León in 1652 (Doc. 55), their gallery contained, in addition to Caravaggio's Crucifixion of St. Andrew (now in the Cleveland Museum of Art, no. 76.2), a Martyrdom of a Bishop Saint also attributed to Caravaggio and a large St. Jerome by Ribera. There was a Madonna and Child with St. John the Baptist attributed to Raphael and a Nativity by Barocci, said to have come from the collection of the eighth conde and therefore probably acquired in Italy.<sup>321</sup> (The Barocci is possibly the work now in the Prado, no. 18.) There was also an Ascension of Christ by Rubens, a lost work perhaps represented in an engraving by Schelte à Bolswert, and a number of copies.<sup>322</sup> Other works were attributed to Bosch, Luca Cambiaso, Franz Floris (a St. Hermangild), and Andrea Salernitano, copies after Raphael and Velázquez. We should also note the remarkable collection of statues, including antiquities and religious pieces – some appear to have been placed outside, others mounted inside, as if in a museum.<sup>323</sup> Many of the entailed pieces of the collection were to be found among these prized statues (see the discussion of entailments, above). Even the miscellaneous objects in the collection were of interest: for example, there was the “espada de Suero de Quiñones que llaman de el passo honrrosso de la puente de orbigo.”

The Benavente collection continued to be important to the end of the century. As Checa and Morán have pointed out, the Benaventes were early collectors of the works of Bartolomé Murillo, owning as many as 40 canvases by the Sevillian master.<sup>324</sup> Finally, at the very end of the century, we have a Conde de Benavente who lived in the royal palace and owned a group of devotional pictures apparently given him by Charles II.<sup>325</sup>

320. Carducho 1633 – reprinted in Sánchez Canton 1923–41, vol. 2, p. 101. It is not clear whether Carducho is referring to the eighth and ninth counts, Don Juan Alfonso and Don Antonio Alfonso, or to Don Antonio and his son, Don Juan Francisco Alfonso, the tenth count. Since the ninth count, Don Antonio died in 1633, he and his father are probably the ones to whom Carducho refers.

The Benavente inventories also teach us several things about both the limits and the possibilities of this type of document as sources for art history. The Museo del Prado possesses a portrait identified as one of the Benaventes, probably Don Juan Francisco Alfonso (the tenth duke), in armor (no. 1193).<sup>326</sup> This highly problematic picture, variously attributed to Titian (!), Velázquez, and Mazo, is of iconographic interest because the conde appears to be wearing the same armor that appears in Titian's Portrait of Philip II, also in the Prado (no. 411). Whether or not the Benavente portrait may be identified with the unattributed "Señor Conde de benavente armado" (no. 139; 400 reales; similar dimensions) in the 1656 inventory of the dowager condesa published here is unclear, but the size and high price make the identification plausible. Of more interest, however, is a Portrait of Don Juan Alfonso de Pimentel, 8th Conde de Benavente, Viceroy of Naples and Valencia, in Armor from the Infantado inventory of 1624 (no. 92), which is described so as to suggest a close relationship to the sixteenth-century formulae epitomized in Titian's Portrait of Philip II, as well as to the Prado's Benavente portrait. Thus, however we explain the use of the same suit of armor in both Prado pictures (ownership by Benavente as a historical piece, workshop model used for a formula portrait, etc.), we must also take into consideration the likelihood that a family portrait tradition was also being honored.

The Later History of the Infantado and Pastrana Collections

We have already seen how the Infantado collections were of some importance in the reigns of Philip II and Philip III. Under Philip IV and Charles II (that is, 1621–1700), the Infantado collections were maintained and eventually merged with those of the house of Pastrana.

Among the many extant sources of information on these two houses, we should note in particular the documents surviving from the Duque de Pastrana's ambassadorship to Rome, 1623–26.<sup>327</sup> The Ambassador, Don Ruy Gómez de Silva de Mendoza y de la Cerda, was the third Duque de Pastrana as well as Prince of the Italian domains

Published by the Museo del Prado, 1975. (The Prado transcription matches the original exactly, except that abbreviations are spelled out.) The objects inventory of the Pieza de las Furias in the Alcázar were not numbered or evaluated because they belonged to the Conde de Benavente (that is, Don Francisco Casimiro Pimentel), who served as Sumiller de Corps to the king. Benavente's ownership of the pictures and other objects was certified both by the word of the late king and by his widow, the Queen Regent. The documents imply that the works were originally part of the royal collection and were subsequently given to Benavente: "Su Magestad (que esta en gloria) declarado in voçe Se le entregasen cuyo decreto ..." There are only a handful of attributions, to Luca Giordano. We should note that the office of Sumiller de Corps was an ecclesiastical position, a type of Royal Chaplain. The pictures on the walls of the Pieza de las Furias were almost exclusively religious. Could Benavente have taken orders late in life?

of Melito and Eboli. He was appointed Ambassador before the Holy See, taking up his duties in March 1623.<sup>328</sup> The duke's daily journals recording the embassy's expenses survive, and from them emerges a picture of the daily activities of a Spanish collector in Seicento Italy.

It is clear from both the Pastrana journals and those of other Spanish agents in Rome during the 1620s (for example, Monterrey and an as yet unidentified ambassador – probably the Duque de Alba – cited in documents in the Alba archives<sup>329</sup>), that many artistic commissions were given for what would today be considered applied or commercial art projects. For example, Pastrana often gave an artist named “Segismundo” minor commissions, including religious images, paintings on stone, and occasional pieces (f. 26a – “Unas pinturas”), but “Segismundo” could also be counted on to prepare gilded shields. Similarly, Giulio Capi was asked to paint 300 coats of arms – decoration for the drums that were to accompany the cavalcade on St. Peter's Day. On a somewhat higher level, the sculptor Orazio Pacifico was commissioned to copy (or perhaps, invent) busts after the antique, and an unidentified painter was asked to supply portraits of the Pope and his nephew (ff. 107b, 99c).

Lamentably, the more significant purchases recorded in the duke's entries are not attributed, and those few artists whose names do appear are not of the first rank. In fact, Giulio and Silvio Capi, Andrea Pelli, and Orazio Pacifico are, as far as can be determined, known to art history only through the ambassador's journal. The painter “Jacomo Duquenoy” mentioned in the documents may have been a member of the same family as the famous sculptors, but is otherwise unknown. “Segismundo” and “Jacomo de Hasse” are difficult to identify, although the documents specify that the latter was a Fleming.<sup>330</sup> Perhaps de Hasse was the Dutch landscape painter Jakob van Hassel. Only two of the artists, the French painter, Jean Turpin (1561 – after 1626), and the Italian sculptor, Francesco Stati (1592 – 1627), have left any historical trace.<sup>331</sup> Both Turpin and Stati are known to have been picture dealers as well as artists; they may have assisted Pastrana in his attempts to acquire works of art.

It is interesting that, of the nine artists mentioned in the Pastrana journals, nearly half are likely to have been of northern European origin. Turpin was a Frenchman, Duquesnoy almost certainly French or Flemish, and Hasse a Fleming or Dutchman. To judge from his name, “Segismundo” was probably a northerner as well.

Of considerably more importance were Pastrana's purchases from Italian, Flemish, and French gold- and silversmiths in Rome and Naples, including table silverware, jewelry, and objets d'art.<sup>332</sup> In all, some 17 artisans received orders from the ambassador, whose relatively simple table silver contrasted with an interest in precious stones and gold chains for dress.

Pastrana's death inventory of 1626 has recently been published,<sup>333</sup> and while it adds evidence of a highly developed love of books (the duke's contemporaries noted his learning and mastery of languages), it also suggests that he had very little interest in collecting pictures. (We recall that Olivares also became a bibliophile rather than a picture collector, perhaps to avoid conflict with Philip IV.) Only two lots are attributed in the inventory: four hermit scenes by a "Cleves" and an image of The Doubting Thomas (or possibly St. Thomas Aquinas with a Crucifix) said to have been painted by the Blessed Luís Beltrán.<sup>334</sup> The remaining 62 lots are mostly portraits or religious works with scanty descriptions.

Until the publication of this inventory, one could assume that the lack of important commissions for paintings documented in Pastrana's journals could be explained by their quasi-official nature, in effect recording "business" expenses, such as decorated parade shields. It is probably for this reason, as Pita Andrade has remarked, that the Italian journals of the Spanish viceroys seem to hold so little interest for modern scholars.<sup>335</sup> But in Pastrana's case, the lack of documentation also indicates a lack of interest. He was a patron – of commercial art, of silversmiths, of book dealers – but he was not a picture collector.

To Pastrana's lackluster collection we must contrast that of his opposite number in the house of Infantado, Don Rodrigo de Mendoza, the seventh duke. Upon Don Rodrigo's death in 1657, his estate included 238 pictures in 160 unnumbered lots.<sup>336</sup> Unfortunately, the inventory itself is often illegible and gives only the barest descriptions and few attributions. Nevertheless, it offers some data on Infantado's collecting activities (and perhaps, by implication, on his role as a patron) in Italy during his embassy to Rome in 1649.

Many of the pictures inventoried in 1657 (especially portraits) are recognizable in a general way from the earlier Infantado inventories discussed above. A large group, however, must have been acquired in Italy, including portraits of Pope Innocent X (1644–55) and other sitters "hecho en Roma" (f. 16). (The description of the pope, "sentado en una silla," immediately brings to mind the portrait by Velázquez of 1649–51, now in the Doria Pamphilj Gallery, Rome.) There was a piece attributed to Bassano; two copies after works by Titian already in Madrid ("the Venus" and an Adam and Eve, ff. 18 and 20); three additional works attributed to Titian (a Magdalene, a Venus and Adonis, f. 20v, and The Tribute Money, f. 34v); two works attributed to Raphael (Virgin and Child with St. Anne, f. 20v, and a small altar with three panels: bof Christ, The Virgin, and St. John, f. 22); a portrait attributed to Andrea del Sarto (f. 22); and an original (Adam and Eve, f. 21) and a copy after Parmigianino (Our Lady, f. 23v). None of these was necessarily acquired in Italy, but the Seicento pictures – a Santiago, an Incarnation, and a Christ with St. John the Baptist by Guido Reni (ff. 20, 22, and 22v); a half-length Santiago by Ribera (f. 24v, possibly now in the Prado, no. 1082); a Venus and Adonis by Albani (f. 21v); and five works by Caracciolo (a small Cupid, f. 20 a Pietà, f. 21, Satyrs and Nymphs, f. 23, and a pair of Diana and Europa, f. 23v) – were most likely the fruits of his sojourn. There were also a panel of Our Lady given to “Carauçeli” (f. 21v), and a half-length portrait of or by “Jacobaçi” (f. 21). Most of the works were secular, many overtly erotic or profane, and quite a number of the anonymous pieces were listed as “miniatures.” Albani, Guercino, and Ribera were still alive in 1649, but only Albani could be found in Rome, and then only intermittently. This suggests that Infantado was principally a collector, with his patronage directed more at landscapists and second-rank artists rather than at the major contemporary figures, except perhaps at long distance.

Among the later collectors of the Infantado-Pastrana family, one must cite Don Gregorio de Silva Mendoza y Sandoval (1640–93), Duque de Pastrana and del Infantado. The dismounted equestrian portrait of the duke by Juan Carreño de Miranda (Prado, no. 650), in addition to demonstrating the continued influence of Van Dyck in later seventeenth-century Spanish art, is a magnificent creation in its own right and a document of Don Gregorio’s sophisticated patronage of the arts.

Collectors of Lesser Social Status

Investigations of Castilian society in the Golden Age have not, as a rule, focused on non-noble citizens of property, except perhaps in studies of life in Seville.<sup>337</sup> Indeed, the idea of a “middle” class, particularly in the sense of an urban, proto-capitalist bourgeoisie, does not rest well upon Spanish history. At the very least, the self-image of the seventeenth-century Spaniard (as indicated in literature such as the Lazarillo de Tormes and in the pruebas de sangre and other documents of the age) militated against a life of commerce or industry, even while the monetary effects of American silver hampered the growth of the domestic economy.<sup>338</sup> Furthermore, Spain lacked the strong, centralized monarchy that cultivated the middle class in sixteenth-century England and France, not to mention the France of Louis XIV.<sup>339</sup> Although the Spanish prejudice against physical labor and business activities was repeatedly challenged by

337. Bibliography on the question of middle-class life in seventeenth-century Spain may be found in Defourneaux 1966. Defourneaux’s Chapter 3 presents interesting vignettes of urban life in the Madrid of Philip IV and whose Chapter 4 outlines life – including mercantile life – in Seville. See also A. Domínguez Ortiz, Orto y ocaso de Sevilla, 2nd ed., Seville [1974]; and ibid., La sociedad española en el siglo XVII, Madrid 1966. Domínguez Ortiz and F. Aguilar Piñal have also published the seventeenth-century volume in the Historia de Sevilla series of the Universidad de Sevilla (vol. 4, El Barroco y la Ilustración). More recently, Kamen 1980 has devoted an entire chapter to the “Bourgeoisie” (Chapter 9, pp. 260ff.), although his examples are primarily taken from Aragón, Barcelona, and Valencia. Kamen documents a increase in the social importance of the capitalist middle class, but notes that since it was legally and occupationally defined social status, not economic function, that seventeenth-century Spanish society recognized, it is consequently impossible to say exactly what were the boundaries of the “middle” economic group.

338. See Elliott 1963/70, pp. 191–199, on the complicated question of the interrelationship between American silver and Spanish economic problems in the 1600s: “... the most serious failure of all was the failure to devise any scheme for using the supply of American silver for the benefit of the Castilian economy.” (p. 199) Cf. Elliott and F.C. Spooner in NCMH, 4, pp. 436–473 and 67–99, respectively.

339. The most obvious example of the disunity of Spain in the 1600s is perhaps the failure of Olivares’ plan to centralize the army (the so-called “Union of Arms” reform). See Elliott 1963/70, pp. 330–333, and in the New Cambridge Modern History, 4, pp. 463–464.

artists and arbitristas during the seventeenth century, it was still strong enough in 1657 to adversely affect Velázquez's nomination to a knighthood.<sup>340</sup>

Common sense and the example of Barcelona suggest, however, that there must have been sizeable numbers of merchants and other non-noble citizens of property in Madrid as well as in Seville – citizens who, while they were excluded from the centers of power, nevertheless contributed to the economic and cultural life of the kingdom. Furthermore, not everyone at court was a nobleman; the grandees were greatly outnumbered by a host of palace functionaries, government officials, clerics, and military officers, not to mention the staffs and entourages of the lords themselves. (A survey of the professions cited in the documents published here would, for example, include all of these types.) The royal household had become an extended “welfare state” that attracted many educated or skilled Spaniards (such as Velázquez) to Madrid in the hope of finding a sinecure or employment in government service. If these intellectuals and public servants were to be taken together with the merchants, mercantile artisans, and hangers-on about the court, the resulting social group might be considered a “middle” class. Even if it could not be equated with the entrepreneurial bourgeoisies of other European countries, it could be said to have played an analogous role in seventeenth-century Spanish society, serving many of the same functions and constituting an intermediary group between the landed nobility and ordinary peasants and workers.

Earlier estimates concerning the numbers of such non-noble collectors appear to have been much too conservative. With the evidence provided by Peter Cherry's research in the Madrid archives, including hundreds of fairly large collections of approximately 100 items each (84 of which are transcribed here), as well as the nearly 60 collections deemed worthy of mention by the seventeenth-century sources or identified by Pérez Pastor, Saltillo, Agulló y Cobo, Matilla Tascón, Barrio Moya, and other modern investigators, plus over 150 collections, too small or too badly catalogued to be of scholarly significance, published by Agulló y Cobo,<sup>341</sup> we now have at least a respectable cross section of the seventeenth-century records.

Most of the non-noble collectors of seventeenth-century Madrid were involved in some way with the court. They held a court position, or at least, a specified position in the household of a grandee. Many were clergymen, and many others intellectuals in the circle of Olivares or entourage of some other great lord. A few collectors were merely wealthy merchants, but merchants whose aspirations led them toward the aristocracy. Indeed, it is possible to discern a social pattern in the history of families such as the Arces: a merchant grandfather begat a courtier son, who in turn begat a grandson with sufficient wherewithal to gain entrance to a military order and therefore (if only theoretically) into the aristocracy.

Non-Noble Collectors during the Reign of Philip IV

The accession of Philip IV and the subsequent elevation of Olivares to the role of privado brought many Sevillian intellectuals to the court in Madrid. Among these were

For extended discussion and bibliography on the status of artists and the problems surrounding Velázquez's nomination to the Order of Santiago, as they relate to Velázquez's Las Meninas, see Brown 1978, pp. 104–110. Volk 1978, pp. 69–86, also discusses Las Meninas as it relates to the status of artists, but with particular regard to the legal situation which the artists' status engendered.

two former members of Francisco Pacheco's circle of literati and aestheticians: the Canon Don Juan de Fonseca y Figueroa and the courtier-poet Don Juan de Xauregui or Jauregui.<sup>342</sup> Xauregui had played an important role in the literary world of Seville and was an amateur painter of some merit, having studied art in Rome.<sup>343</sup> In Madrid, Xauregui became Master of the Queen's Horse, and he later testified at the trial that sought to establish painting as a liberal art.<sup>344</sup> Carducho does not explicitly state that Xauregui had an art collection, but he does consistently refer to Xauregui in the company of other collectors. Both Xauregui and Fonseca would, of course, have known the Duque de Alcalá, one of Seville's foremost collectors, through Pacheco's academy. It is difficult to assume that Xauregui would have become such a developed antiquarian, aesthetician, and art expert – not to mention a painter – without having acquired at least a modest gallery of his own.

Don Juan de Fonseca y Figueroa is well known to the history of art by virtue of his having protected Velázquez during the artist's early years in Madrid.<sup>345</sup> He was a close associate of Pacheco, a member of Pacheco's circle, and the Canon Schoolmaster of the Cathedral School in Seville.<sup>346</sup> In Madrid, Fonseca served as the sumiller de cortina, a type of royal chaplain. Velázquez appraised Fonseca's estate upon the cleric's death in 1627. The tasación is perhaps as interesting for the light it throws on Velázquez's expertise at this point in his career as for the inventoried works themselves: Velázquez attributes only his own Water Seller, a group of works by Orrente, and, as it seems, a piece by Cerano. (The Water Seller also drew the highest evaluation.) Velázquez's canvas seems to have been the most avant-garde work in what was, by 1627, a slightly out-of-date collection.

Fonseca was a cleric – Xauregui is said to have become a priest as well – and indeed, the clergy made up one of the more important groups of non-noble collectors in Madrid. Until the 1830s, the Spanish Church retained enormous financial resources, which could often be tapped for the support of intellectuals or, as in the case of Mayno and Cano, artists. And just as an archbishop could divert revenues to his personal use, so could a commoner with a religious vocation underwrite his acquisitions with church funds.<sup>347</sup> There is mention of the collections of Don Bartolomé de Castro, Archdeacon of Burgos, the Canon José de León y Ledesma of Seville, the priest (Licenciado) Francisco Manuel, and another priest, Gregorio López Madera, whom Carducho describes as an amateur painter.<sup>348</sup> In 1674, a capellán de honor de Su Majestad, Francisco López de Nájera, left works attributed to Carducho, Morales, and Titian.<sup>349</sup>

347. Ecclesiastical benefices were not always restricted to use by members of the clergy. For example, Pacheco records that Velázquez received a pension of 300 ducats, which required a papal dispensation from Urban VIII (Pacheco 1956, vol. 1, p. 157 – repeated verbatim by Palomino 1947, p. 898). The implication is that the monies had been dedicated to Church use. The transaction has recently been documented by E. Harris, “Velázquez and his Ecclesiastical Benefice,” The Burlington Magazine, 123a (1981), pp. 95–96 – citing Vatican Library MS. Barb. lat. 6125, f. 320 (Jones no. 206). The memorial requesting the dispensation also declares that “this granting of ecclesiastical benefices to laymen is what has been done by Popes of blessed memory, so that there are many others who today enjoy ecclesiastical pensions although they are married ...”

Perhaps the most famous of the seventeenth-century cleric-collectors was Don Juan de Espina, who died in 1643. He was said to have owned two autograph manuscripts by Leonardo da Vinci.<sup>350</sup> Espina's house was a magnet for both connoisseurs and the merely curious; his guests included the Prince of Wales, the future Charles I of England. Carducho and the Jesuit Padre González, another contemporary source, repeat words like "exquisite," "most curious," and "singularly rare" in attempting to describe Espina's house and collection. González tells us that the source of support was some 5,000 ducats in annual ecclesiastical rents, a very considerable sum in 1643. In addition to his house in Madrid, Espina owned a villa, said to contain treasures worth 30,000 escudos; it was willed, along with many of Espina's other treasures, to Philip IV. (Already in 1633, Carducho had reported that it was Espina's intent to will the Leonardo manuscripts to the king.)

The rank of Non-Noble Collectors in Madrid society

Whether clerical or secular, the ranks of courtiers (and therefore of collectors) were ordered by the rigid, if somewhat horizontal, structure of Habsburg court etiquette.<sup>351</sup> In general, the upper strata of palace society were inhabited by the princes, grandees, and most powerful state officials, but the non-noble collectors under study here could occasionally join the uppermost circles. For example, the Italian courtier Giovanni Battista Crescenzi, whose family background gave him the status of gentry but whose wealth and career were more typically bourgeois, was created a marqués.<sup>352</sup> Many other middle-level court functionaries, including a few collectors, were rewarded with the habit of a knight. Many of the collectors documented in the archives were members of a military order, especially that of Santiago, which seems to have had many intellectual members. If a member of an order could also arrange to be appointed a comendador or obtain one of the order's benefices, the order itself would become a source of livelihood.<sup>353</sup> Other collectors, including Don Claudio Pimentel (Alcántara), who may have been related to the Benavente family, were gentlemen-in-waiting to the king.<sup>354</sup> Pimentel owned a set of Apostles by Ribera and a Cleopatra with an Asp, a subject popular with Italian Seicento masters. Like Don Juan de Xauregui, the collector Don Francisco Velázquez Minaya was a Master of the Queen's Horse,<sup>355</sup> and another collector, Don Suero de Quiñones (Santiago), was alférez mayor de Leon.<sup>356</sup> Quiñones' connoisseurship and ethics were not above question, but he seems nevertheless to have had a significant enough collection to have been asked to sell pictures to the Buen Retiro.<sup>357</sup> Sir Arthur Hopton's letters mention an as-yet-unidentified Venus by Luca Cambiaso and another work by Tintoretto in Quiñones' possession.<sup>358</sup> Velázquez Minaya is said to have painted, but it is not clear what kind of collection he may have had.

A number of collectors held responsible positions in the day-to-day government of the Spanish kingdoms. Juan Polo de Gamoz (Santiago) was corregidor de Madrid; he possessed a fine library but only a disappointingly few paintings.<sup>359</sup> Jerónimo Funes or Fures Muñoz was a member of the Supreme Council of Italy,<sup>360</sup> while Lorenzo Ramírez was said to have been "del Consejo de Su Majestad."<sup>361</sup> Muñoz, in addition to his duties on the Council of Italy, was a gentleman-in-waiting, a member of Santiago, and the "conservador general of the king's Real Patrimonio de los Reinos de Nápoles, Sicilia y Estado de Milán." Carducho, in his Diálogos, finds Muñoz at work painting an emblem, and comments on his fine masterpieces, which, given his involvement with Italy, must have included many Italian works.<sup>362</sup> Muñoz later testified for the pruebas of Velázquez's nomination to the Order of Santiago.<sup>363</sup> The Prince of Wales is also said to have visited his collection.

The scholarship of J. Fayard has further illuminated the role of important Spanish officials in collecting works of art.<sup>364</sup> Fayard listed the inventories of some 27 members (or wives of members) of the Consejo de Castilla from 1623 to 1752. In this publication, documents of four such members have been included. Each of these collections had at least 20 works, most had 50 to 80, and in several cases, the collections were quite large indeed. For example, Doña Teresa González de Sepúlveda, the wife of council member Don Martín Iñiguez de Arnedo, owned 90 pictures in 1645, while Don Bernardo de Ipeñarrieta had 135 (1651). Don Agustín de Hierro, who died in 1666, owned a number of works by El Greco among 150 pictures, and Don Pedro Nuñez de Guzmán (whose inventory is included here) owned original canvases by Orrente and Valdés Leal among over 200 paintings (1683). Doña María de Vera, widow of Don Juan González de Uzqueta, left over 750 pictures, including works attributed to Tintoretto, Veronese, and Velázquez, when she died in 1692. As Fayard noted, many of these collectors patronized Spanish artists along with the Italians and Flemish.

Another group of collectors served as secretaries to the Spanish kings. The earliest of these collectors, Don Antonio de Arostegui, died in 1623, and so may have served Philip III.<sup>365</sup> The collector Don Francisco de Oviedo was a secretary and

But since I have written to his lordship acquainting him, that Don Suero had plaid the jade with mee and sold the peece I most esteemed which was that of Luqueto whereuppon wee are growne strangers, and in truth I neither finde him a man to bee dealt with, nor myselfe of a condition to deale with such as hee is." gentleman-in-waiting to Philip IV,<sup>366</sup> and Juan Ramón Vallesteros and Bartolomé Moreno (Santiago) served Charles II.<sup>367</sup> Like many other collectors, Don Bartolomé owned Flemish landscapes, as well as two works attributed to El Greco. In all, the present study documents the collections of 13 secretaries.

The career of one non-noble collector documented here, Don Jerónimo de Cuellar, offers a glimpse of the typical path that a successful courtier might follow in seventeenth-century Madrid. He began his court service on 26 August 1650, when he (like Velázquez earlier in the century) was sworn in as an ayuda de cámara to Philip IV.<sup>368</sup> By 1666, in the reign of Charles II, Don Jerónimo had been appointed the Secretario de la Cámara y Estado de Castilla. His wages – constantly in arrears – amounted to 12 reales per day, or 148,920 maravedíes per year. By 1674, the year of his death, Don Jerónimo had become a member of the “Consejo [not specified] de Su Magestad” and a member of Santiago.<sup>369</sup> Like many other royal servants, Cuellar was also a man of letters, having written the comedy, Cada cual en su negocio.<sup>370</sup>

Don Jerónimo was not the only member of the Cuellar family on the palace payroll. A Gregorio de Cuellar was apparently the royal wine merchant (Provedor de la cava de Su Majestad) from about 1647 to 1660; he had worked in that office with his uncle and cousin.<sup>371</sup> A Don Antonio de Cuellar was ugier de saleta to the household of the prince and the infantes (that is, to the queen’s household, the queen herself having died) in 1644. It is not clear if one of these Cuellars was Don Jerónimo’s father.<sup>372</sup>

The parallels between the careers of Cuellar and Velázquez – both were court officials, both were given the Habit of Santiago just before their deaths – throw some light on the means by which court artists might attract non-noble patrons. It may be assumed that Don Jerónimo would have come into contact with Velázquez in the course of their official duties, although Velázquez was, by the 1650s, one of the highest-ranking officials at court. As must have been obvious, Velázquez was the king’s confidant as well, and Cuellar may have thought it would help his career at court to patronize the king’s favorite painter.

In any case, Cuellar, like Pedro de Arce, became a collector of Velázquez’s works. At the time of his death, Cuellar owned five half-length portraits of members of the royal family attributed to Velázquez, including a half-length Portrait of Philip IV in Hunting Dress.<sup>373</sup> It has not been possible to identify these pieces with extant works; they may have been products of Velázquez’s shop. Cuellar’s other works were principally Flemish: two pieces attributed to Rubens and a number of Flemish landscapes and cityscapes exhaust the list of attributed works in his inventory. The prices set on some of the works are, however, of interest: two fruteros are evaluated at 1,800 and 2,000 reales, respectively, the same price as that given to a much larger (4½ x 3 varas versus 2½ x 3) Equestrian Portrait of the Cardinal Infante.<sup>374</sup> In comparison, the somewhat smaller portraits by Velázquez were evaluated at 1,000 to 1,500 reales each.

The ranks of non-noble collectors included other responsible members of the royal household. For example, Carducho cites the collection of Don Jerónimo de Villafuerte Zapata, guardajoyas to Philip IV.<sup>375</sup> Agulló y Cobo cites the collection of the apostador Don Bernabé de Gainza Allafor and his wife, Doña Juana Velázquez de Gauna, who owned several Italian pieces among over 50 pictures.<sup>376</sup> Seven of the collectors documented in the present study held the post of contador, or financial official, in either the king's service or that of some great lord. In addition, we can cite Don Francisco de Arévalo, "Contador de Su Magd en su contaduría mayor de quantas."<sup>377</sup> The collection of Arévalo is principally of interest for its wide variety of Marian devotional images: he seems to have made an attempt to collect an example of the image associated with each of the most popular cults of the Virgin. A colleague of Arévalo, Jerónimo Gonzales (he is not styled "Don" in the documents), had collected 59 lots of paintings by the time of his death in 1669,<sup>378</sup> none of Gonzales' paintings, and none of the works in the collection of Don Gabriel Elipio de Prado, contador to the Conde del Castrillo,<sup>379</sup> were attributed in their respective inventories. The collection of Pedro de Torres, plumajero del Rey (literally, "plume-maker" or "feather-dresser," originally a palace staff position, but possibly a sinecure by the time of Philip IV), and his wife, Doña Catalina de Miranda, contained two works attributed to Bassano.<sup>380</sup> (The socially mobile Doña Catalina later contracted marriage to Don Leonardo de la Mota of the Order of Santiago.)

The enthusiasm for pictures seems to have permeated even the lowest levels of court society, not to mention the ranks of Spaniards outside the palace walls. Pedro Muñoz, portero de cámara, owned four Flemish landscapes and some 26 other paintings at the time of his wife's death in 1624.<sup>381</sup> Agulló y Cobo cites the collection of Daniel Sabola, mercader de lonja (a wool or hide merchant?), which included copies after Ribera and Artemesia Gentileschi.<sup>382</sup> Sabola, who, to judge from his name, may have been an Italian, had died in 1632, with his paintings being evaluated by the painter Francisco Barrera. Sabola's heirs, however, were dissatisfied with the low prices Barrera assigned to the pictures and asked Jusepe Leonardo to re-appraise the works. (As it turned out, Leonardo's evaluations were only slightly higher than those of Barrera.) Finally, there was the collection of "Juan Fernández, Labrador," who died in 1657.<sup>383</sup> Both Agulló y Cobo and the present author interpret the document to mean that Fernández was a laborer or small farmer, not someone named "Fernández Labrador" – compare the inheritance of Don Gaspar de Haro's gardener, cited above.<sup>384</sup>

As noted earlier, Spain's participation in European affairs throughout the seventeenth century required the presence of Spanish agents in many foreign cities. It is reasonable to assume that, like noblemen, many non-noble Spaniards sought service abroad as well. Indeed, Spanish agents such as Don Alonso de Cárdenas in London have been shown to have played important roles in the acquisition of pictures for Madrid. We may also cite the “magnifico” Don Joseph de Almarza and the maestro de campo Don Pablo de Leon, both of whom died in Naples in 1670. Almarza, who may have been associated with the Conde de Oñate, owned more than 140 pictures, none of which was attributed in his inventory. (The occasionally high evaluations in the tasación document the monetary exchange system in use in Naples at the time.) Don Pablo de León also owned a great many paintings, some of which may have been shipped back to Madrid and sold there at an almoneda.<sup>385</sup> There seems to be no evidence regarding the fate of Almarza’s collection.

One further note concerning Don Pablo de León: his title, maestro de campo, seems to imply a military career, and one might similarly expect to find many former Spanish officers – veterans of service abroad – among the non-noble collectors in Madrid. This has so far not proven to be the case. We do have the Spanish soldier, Captain Martín de Aguirre, who gave power of attorney to a canon in Plasencia in 1631 in order that the Canon might receive a five-paneled tapestry set.<sup>386</sup> A number of collectors at court had secondary careers in the armed forces, and others served occasionally in the Spanish armies. Rodrigo de Tapia, for example, was a caballerizo – which, given the importance of the horse in seventeenth-century warfare, was a semi-military post. Furthermore, Tapia participated in the battle of Fuenterrabia, was appointed Captain of the Spanish Guards, and was the officer in charge of escorting both the Infanta María (Queen of Hungary; later the Empress) to Germany in 1629 and the new Queen Mariana to Spain in 1649–50.<sup>387</sup> Gabriel de Ocaña served as Captain of the Madrid Militia, but this may have been due to his position as Regidor Decano.<sup>388</sup> The documents attached to this book mention two other caballerizos: the Conde de Humanes and Hernando de Espejo.

The ranks of collectors in Madrid also included a number of Italians. Among these collectors was Don Flavio Atti, the ambassador of the Duca di Parma, who died in 1639, leaving a modest gallery of unattributed works.<sup>389</sup> A Cristóbal Colomo – who may be assumed to be Italian on the basis of his name – died in 1656, with his pictures being appraised by Juan Carreño.<sup>390</sup> One of Colomo’s works was specified as having come from Italy. Agulló y Cobo cites a Don Francisco Filippini, a native of Urbino, who came to Madrid to be a relojero – probably a clock-merchant or manufacturer rather than a mere repairer – to the Crown.<sup>391</sup> Filippini was a knight of the Papal Order of St. John Lateran (caballero de hábito de San Juan de Letrán), a dignity that presumably aided his success at court. Unfortunately, only one of his pictures seems to have been attributed: an “echura de Cruz de Caravaca [Caravaggio?].” That Italian artists continued to be a conduit for their countrymen’s works may be demonstrated by the inventory of the Italian sculptor Giovanni Battista Morelli, who died in Madrid in 1669, leaving two Perspectives by Codazzi.<sup>392</sup>

In 1596 a Melchior Maldonado bought 12 works attributed to Bassano (among other paintings) from Bartolomé Carducho.<sup>393</sup> In 1646, an inventory taken upon the marriage of Don Álamo de Parada y Mendoza to Doña Jerónima Méndez de Jibaja y Montalvo lists a copy after Correggio, a Portrait of a Pope, and “dos láminas de Bolcano de atauría entera de Napoles”.<sup>394</sup> The painter, Juan Bautista Santolus, at the time of his wife’s death in 1644 (inventory in 1646), owned copies after Ribera and Annibale Carracci,<sup>395</sup> and a Doña María de Rivadeneira brought works by Domenichino and Bassano, as well as a copy after Bassano, to her marriage in 1657.<sup>396</sup> Finally, in 1693, Don José Rubín of the Order of Santiago left pictures attributed to Titian, the School of Bassano, Pietro da Cortona, Giacinto Brandi, and other Italians.<sup>397</sup> Rubín also owned two copies after Correggio, including one after what was presumably the Venus and Mercury Instructing Cupid in the Carpio collection. Offsetting the Italian influence, however, was the presence of Flemish landscapes and decorative pictures (and we might add Netherlandish maps and prints, especially devotional images).

Don Pedro de Arce

Among the non-noble collections of seventeenth-century Madrid, one gallery stands out so singularly as to demand the treatment accorded to the foremost aristocratic collections. The picture collection of Don Pedro de Arce first came to the attention of art historians with the publication by María Luisa Caturla in 1948 of the fact that Arce had apparently owned Velázquez’s Las Hilanderas.<sup>398</sup> This fact alone would make his life and acquisitions of interest to modern scholarship, but the possession of a lone canvas by Velázquez does not begin to exhaust the importance of his collection. In 1664, Arce inventoried more than 200 pictures, including works attributed to Tintoretto, Bassano, Palma, Cambiaso, Sebastiano del Piombo, Giulio Romano, Stanzione, Codazzi, Borgianni, Morales, Navarrete, Becerra, El Greco, Ribera, Nardi, Caxés, Carducho, Orrente, Ribalta, Velázquez, and many others. What is more, the extensive documentation of Don Pedro’s career that has come to light offers considerable insight into both collecting and life in general at court in seventeenth-century Madrid.

The details of Arce’s collecting are given below in the entry for his documents, but we may use his example to offer some general observations about non-noble collections. In the first place, a collector like Arce was a connoisseur in the full sense of the word: he was constantly acquiring, refining, attributing, and shaping his collection to reflect a distinct personal taste. This is also true of the non-noble collectors who emphasized Flemish art (compare the Cuellar collection), while Arce’s taste was decidedly Italianate, perhaps due to the influence of the Italian-born Nardi – and of Velázquez. It is an important aspect of Arce’s collection from the very beginning.

Since certification of nobility in seventeenth-century Spain depended not only on wealth and national service but also on public image and adherence to often highly arbitrary social values (such as the proscription of business activity), a picture collection might have proved useful to someone seeking to improve his social position. It would have been, in effect, an advertisement for the noble character of its owner. Furthermore, as long as Velázquez was alive, an important collector of any rank could be assured of contact with the king's inner circle. Even if that contact were a normal result of the collector's function at court, as in the case of Pedro de Arce, collecting might have been a means of catching Philip's eye. This is not to suggest that Arce, Cuellar, and other courtiers of middle rank collected merely to advance their careers, but it does indicate that seventeenth-century society, to use a biological metaphor, tended to select in favor of those who owned pictures. Even when an individual's interests were sufficient motivation for collecting art, the works so acquired functioned as the accoutrement of upward social mobility.

An interesting addendum to Arce’s collection may be found in the collection of the Duque de Medinaceli, who died in 1711; he, too, apparently owned either Arce’s canvas or a version. See V. Lleó Cañal, “The Art Collection of the Ninth Duke of Medinaceli,” in The Burlington Magazine, 131a, no. 1031, February 1989, pp. 108–115.

In fact, non-noble collectors like Cuellar and Arce had a great deal in common with their aristocratic counterparts. Their collecting was grounded in a common social milieu and therefore, to a large extent, in common assumptions. Both the nobleman and the merchant-courtier led lives that centered on the court, and the fortunes of both depended upon royal favor. Both would have been influenced by the taste of the king, by the styles of the king's painters, and by the aesthetic and legal debates on the status of the plastic arts that punctuated the age. Furthermore, even these attempts to elevate the status of the arts underscore the basic similarities between the world-views of noblemen and other courtiers. To put it another way, many of those seeking to improve their own lot in life seem to have accepted the very values that had relegated them to inferior rank in the first place. Both Velázquez and the younger Arce, for example, tried only to prove that they were noble (or perhaps, if the current understanding of Las Meninas continues to prove correct, that a given profession was noble),<sup>399</sup> not that the prejudices against craftsmanship and business were wrong. Similarly, the artists who sued the Treasury in 1633 had little interest in changing the prevailing attitude about manual labor; they also sought an exemption only for art, a certification of art's more elevated status, which in any case was limited to the art of painting.<sup>400</sup> The goal was personal or professional improvement, not revolution.

In sum, we may characterize the acquisition of pictures by non-noble Spaniards as a form of mimicry. Pedro de Arce, who, in spite of his wearing a cape and sword as he supervised the Royal Mint, could have had little hope of being accepted as a peer by the nobles of his time, nevertheless cultivated an aristocratic passion. And indeed, there was one sense in which he was the equal of the noblest grandee: on the walls of his gallery were pictures worthy of a king.

Like their contemporaries in France, the Netherlands, Italy, and England, the Spanish of the Golden Age found something significant in assembling galleries primarily of fine pictures, but also of sculpture, antiquities, tapestries, and objets d'art. From a distance of three hundred years, we may also find significance in what Philip III and Philip IV, Lerma and Don Luis de Haro, Alcalá and Leganés, the almirantes, Monterrey, and Don Gaspar de Haro accomplished.

400. See Volk 1978, pp. 69–86, for a discussion of the maneuverings of artists for a better social position in seventeenth-century Spain. The history of the application of the alcabala tax to painting and the subsequent theoretical defense of painting as a liberal art is drawn by Gállego 1976, pp. 19–51ff., with detailed examinations of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century discussions of the matter. See also Brown 1978, p. 102 and notes, for further bibliography. Amazingly, Palomino 1947, pp. 161–163, who was writing in 1715, seems to treat the relative status of painting as a live issue.

THE INVENTORY PROCESS

The reasons for which seventeenth-century art collections were inventoried, appraised and recorded were the same whether the property in question belonged to noblemen or commoners. The following represent the most important:

(1) Deaths of heads of households (e.g. inventory, appraisal [tasaciones], partition, estate sale [almoneda]) (see below);

(2) Marriages, (e.g. capital, dowry) especially in the case when one or both of the partners had been married before and were bringing entailed or legally encumbered estates to the new conjoint (but not common) property, as in the case of goods held in trust for minor children;

(3) Business contracts and partnerships (e.g. lists of capital specific to the business, inventories at the death of a partner);

(4) Sequestrations as a result of legal proceedings, Inquisition condemnations, or political processes (e.g. inventories, sales);

(5) Changes of residence, especially in the case of embassies to foreign countries, where the separation of the personal property of an ambassador or viceroy and the Crown was essential; or changes in personnel, since the financial affairs of large estates were held as a personal responsibility by estate financial officers (e.g. inventories, appraisals, shipping lists);

(6) Estate sales undertaken for their own sake, for reasons of temporary insolvency during the lifetime of a collector, refining the quality of a collection, etc.

In the case of the estates of deceased residents, the full sequence of legal events seems to have been the following:

(a) certification of death and petition for a notarized inventory;

(b) the inventory, usually taken by members of the family under supervision of a notary – postmortem estate inventories had to be done within thirty days of the death (See “Painter-Appraisers” in Seventeenth-Century Spanish Taste, p. 52 for more details on this process);

(c) a theoretical liquidation of the estate via a tasación, or official appraisal, the evaluations of which were binding on any future sales; the tasador (appraiser) would have to be a master painter if the estate included a sizeable picture collection.

(d) a partición, or division of property among the heirs, beginning with the establishment of a cuerpo de hacienda, or official statement of assets, divided into hijuelas, or inheritance portions. This process was not governed by primogeniture, except to the extent that particular rents, real estate, castles, and even paintings and other objects had been incorporated into a mayorazgo, or entailed estate. Furthermore, as was implied above, a widow’s dowry and the other assets which she had brought to her marriage remained her personal property and were not partitioned until her death. In addition to the inheritance portions, there was a part of the estate set aside for funeral and other expenses and a portion reserved for specific bequests of the deceased.

(e) the actual paying out (pago) of the estate, which might require bartering and trades, an estate sale, or other means of converting real property and moveable goods to cash.

(f) if necessary (for example, because of insolvency, a trial, or disagreements among the heirs), an almoneda, or estate sale, at which goods were actually sold or transferred to creditors in lieu of cash payments (for example, to the crown in payment of death duties), would be held. The remaining assets were then divided among the heirs, who were free to purchase objects in the sale. The appraised prices generated by the tasación then became the prices for which the objects were to be sold or traded against the demands of creditors. (See “Painter-Appraisers” in Seventeenth-Century Spanish Taste, pp. for more details on this process.) The appraised prices could theoretically be altered only by repeating the entire evaluation process with a second tasador. Given the debts of many Spanish nobles, such almonedas were a common phenomenon in seventeenth-century Madrid, or even among the Spanish overseas, as suggested by the case of the Duque de Alcalá’s sale in Genoa. Needless to say, the almoneda system ensured the continuing re-dissemination of the works brought to Madrid by the viceroys.

Currencies

The peculiar financial situation of the Spanish crown in the seventeenth century – particularly its reliance on the influx of American silver and its tendency to run a perpetual deficit – injects a certain amount of complexity into the evaluation process. The basic monetary unit of the period, the silver real (real de plata), is represented in the inventories as one of the monies of account, along with ducats (11 reales) and maravedies (worth approximately  $\frac{1}{34}$  of a real). However, the actual coinage in use on the street also included what we would today recognize as a “modern” currency: a brass coin, the real de vellón, whose worth in silver depended very much on the fiscal policies of the crown. Initially understood to be equivalent to a real de plata, the vellón currency often inflated, only to be restored to parity by royal decrees, such as that of October 1664, although by mid-1665 inflation had once again reduced the value of the vellón coinage to 87% that of silver. Inventories, especially in the second half of the century, can give evaluations in reales de plata or reales de vellón, depending on the objects to be appraised – silverware, for example, could be weighed and its price given in reales de plata. These were then converted to monies of account, ducats or maravedies, at a fixed rate for reales de plata and at a floating rate for reales de vellón. The inventories transcribed in this publication use only reales de vellón.

Inflation of both seventeenth- and twentieth-century currencies make it nearly impossible to calculate specific modern values for seventeenth-century prices. We can, however, get a sense of the relative worth of pictures by noting that unskilled workers in the 1620s often received one real as a minimum day’s wages – even at the royal sites, such as the Buen Retiro in the 1630s, the unskilled wage was only 4–5 reales a day. A painting appraised at 1000 reales in the 1620s would therefore represent an extremely valuable asset. However, at least for the great nobles, the large amounts involved in purchasing art, while enormous, were only a small fraction of their annual cash flow. For example, we have described the great wealth of the duchy of Infantado, with an annual flux of 100,000 ducats per annum, generating a daily income (admittedly highly mortgaged) of about 3000 reales, or between 600 and 3000 times the daily minimum wage.

Evaluations were a necessary part of the notarial process not only for practical purposes, but also because of the Roman Catholic doctrine of “just price,” in which the value of any commodity was determined by quantifying its usefulness to all people generally rather than by allowing market forces of supply and demand to operate in a specific instance. Hence, the notary had to appeal to someone qualified not only in terms of knowledge of current prices but also in terms of appreciating value – aesthetic value, in the case of a work of art. We should therefore remain aware of the highly subjective nature of the undertaking, since there were, in addition to the opportunities for human error in describing and measuring each work, at least two points in which the inventory and evaluation process relied on personal judgments: establishing an attribution and setting a just price.

Thus, at least in theory, every tasación was an exercise in connoisseurship, as perhaps best illustrated in the Carpio inventory taken at Rome in 1682 (Doc. 109). In this document, the appraiser, who seems to have been forced to use attributions provided by the collector himself, was nevertheless constrained to put low prices on those objects whose attribution he doubted; he used the appraised values to offer a critique of the attributions received. Furthermore, the relationship between attributions and prices serves as an important indicator of taste, which of course changed over time. That the moments of greatest subjectivity in the process are exactly the points at which art historical interest is greatest ought to warn us of the limits of inventories as grounds for connoisseurship, analysis, and historical evaluation. Within these limits, however, the inventories represent some of our best tools for exploring the past.

INVENTORIES

Notes on the Transcription

The majority of inventories published here are deposited in the Archivo Histórico de Protocolos in Madrid. This archive name is abbreviated “AHPM” in citations giving the location of the documents. Other archives cited are: the Archivo Histórico Nacional in Madrid, “AHNM,” the Archivo de la Casa Alba, Palacio de Liria in Madrid, “ACAM,” and the Archivo Histórico de Protocolos in Valladolid, “AHPV.” The inventories have been organized in chronological order. The transcriptions preserve the literal spelling and punctuation as they appear in the original documents. We have extracted the paintings from each inventory and numbered them in the order in which they occur in the document. These imposed numbers appear in square brackets [ ] before each entry. There are also numbers originally assigned in some inventories: these numbers appear in the text of each entry, generally at the beginning.

With some of the inventories transcribed here, we have included so-called “annotations” – that is, relevant marginal information written in the inventory at a later date and indicated in the transcription section with the preceding abbreviation “Annot.”

Iñigo López de Mendoza de la Vega y Luna y Fonseca, Conde del Cid, Marqués de Santillana and del Cenete, and Duque del Infantado

1601 (copy ca. 1626–33)

The importance of the Infantado family as patrons and collectors from the sixteenth century until the late seventeenth century has been discussed in the Introduction, above.<sup>1</sup> Later inventories and related documents are discussed below, in the entries for Documents 9 and 10.

The 1601 Infantado inventory recorded pictures sent to Guadalajara from Rome by Cardinal Mendoza and the Duque de Feria, Italian pictures bought in Madrid, and a relatively large number of secular subjects, including newly popular still-life compositions and bodegones.

The present document consists of authorized copies, made between 1626 and 1633, of a 1601 inventory (part 3, ff. 1–152) and proceedings for an almoneda (part 3, ff. 152 ff.) for the estate of Don Iñigo López de Mendoza de la Vega y Luna y Fonseca, Marqués de Santillana y del Cenete, Conde del Cid, and 5th Duque del Infantado, who died at his palace in Guadalajara on 29 August 1601.<sup>2</sup>

The inventory began on 3 September 1601, with the almoneda proceedings taking place in April 160[2?] and following. No record of a valuation is copied in the Archivo Histórico Nacional documents. Folios 191–232 copy a will of 12 May 1581; documents from the 1620s follow. Folios 1–50 are a general inventory of furniture, real estate, etc.; ff. 51–55 list paintings (“lienzos de pintura”); ff. 83–87 inventory a library. The inventory continues to f. 152.

Ana Antonia de Velasco, Marquesa de Celada

Ana Antonia de Velasco, Marquesa de Celada died 25 February 1617, and the following inventory/valuation was started 2 March 1617.<sup>1</sup> It was drawn up by her husband, Alonso Fernández de Córdoba, Marqués de Celada and Majordomo de Su Majestad.

The paintings in the collection were appraised by Domingo Gómez, while the paintings in the oratory were separately appraised by Juan Sánchez. There was a sale of her goods beginning 15 April 1617.

This collection included just 45 items of value, none of which are attributed to a specific artist. The paintings consisted primarily of religious subjects, but there were also a few portraits, flower pieces, and even a view of Venice. Five pieces of sculpture were also included as well as a group of eight small “images of illumination” (luminacion). Some of the paintings carried surprisingly high valuations. A painting of the Nativity was given the highest figure, being appraised at 2.000 reales. An Assumption of the Magdalene was listed at 550 reales, and five others, including the View of Venice, were given amounts in excess of 300 reales. A portrait of the deceased Marquesa was valued at 500 reales. The author of this portrait was probably known to her husband but his name is not given.

Gil Ramírez de Arellano rose to prominence in public life during the reign of Philip III and the privanza of the Duque de Lerma. In 1602 he was one of the two lawyers (fiscales or procuradores generales) of the Council of Castile.<sup>1</sup> This office normally led to an appointment to the Council itself, and probably a year later this occurred. Ramírez was protected by the Condes de Lemos and rose to become a member of the Consejo de Cámara in 1614.<sup>2</sup>

The inventory of Gil Ramírez de Arellano, which was begun in Madrid on 24 February 1618, was drawn up by his widow Catalina González de Medina. The paintings of the collection were inventoried in three separate categories: portraits (“Cosas de retrato,” ff. 1293–1296), religious paintings from the oratory (“Oratorio baxo,” ff. 1299–1302), and pictures from the gallery (“Cossas de la Galeria alta,” ff. 1306v–1311v). The bracketed information appended to the transcription of some items comes from the subsequent valuation.

Ramírez de Arellano’s picture collection, which contained a broad range of subject paintings, was typical of its time in the numbers of series paintings displayed. Thus, there were sets of Roman emperors (no. 14), sibyls (no. 73), foreign ladies (no. 74), provincial costumes (no. 93), famous cities (no. 105), the Elements (no. 75), the Months (nos. 95, 97), the story of Noah (no. 60), and hermit saints (nos. 46, 98), totaling some 110 paintings. Some of these appear, however, to have been pictures of considerable quality; the Roman emperors were listed as “quadros rricos” (no. 14), one set of hermit saints (no. 46) described as “rica pintura” and twelve months qualified as “rica la pintura” (no. 97). Sixty fine landscape paintings also hung here (nos. 76, 91), along with five landscape friezes (no. 77) and twenty-eight works of lesser quality (nos. 78, 85, 100, 104, 108), mostly tempera paintings.

One of the most interesting aspects of Ramírez de Arellano’s taste is represented by the portrait collection that hung at the family seat (señorío) at Villaescusa de Haro, in the province of Cuenca. While he did not own a collection of portraits of famous men, by the time of his death he had assembled a gallery of dynastic family portraits to be handed on to the next generation. Such a display of family pride pointedly resembled those of great noble houses, and even the royal collection. The family’s “casa de los antepasados” was the appropriate setting for these portraits, which were intended to impress on visitors and the family alike the distinction of the bloodline. The first room was hung with a series of 17 full-length labeled portraits, culminating in that of Gil Ramírez de Arellano himself, which traced his ancestry from the royal house of Navarre (no. 1). As well as manifesting the family’s noble status, this display was also “proof” of their Old Christian origins, which was always a preoccupation of prominent Spanish public figures of the period. There were three other family portraits in this room, and a large coat of arms over the door (no. 3). A further room was hung with portraits of 11 archbishops who were also members of the family (no. 4); another with 14 portraits of the related family of the noble Condes de Aguilar (no. 5); and another with 16 portraits of illustrious relatives of Ramírez de Arellano (no. 6). Here were also the portraits of ancient Roman emperors; Gil Ramírez de Arellano may have sought to imply that his clan ultimately descended from ancient imperial lineage by adding his coat of arms to the center of a picture of the founding of Rome (no. 15 the entry misidentifying Aeneas leaving Troy for Rome) that headed one of the series of Roman emperors (no. 14). There were portraits of the Spanish House of Austria, although no portrait of the válido, the Duque de Lerma, was listed. Fifteen Ramírez de Arellano coats of arms hung along with royal portraits in his gallery (no. 71), clearly manifesting the extent to which the aspirations of the family were pinned to the Habsburg mast.

Ramírez de Arellano appears to have had a taste for allegorical images (pensamientos or jeroglificos, as these sorts of images were called in the period). Such images would include his “hieroglyph of Adam, Death, and Life” (no. 42, see also no. 12), another of a crossbowman (no. 107), and perhaps four paintings of triumphs of Faith, Hope, Charity, and Prudence (no. 35, see also no. 30). There were also two curiosities: paintings of men and women whose eyes moved (no. 72). The only attributed paintings in this collection were by “the famous painter Titian,” the painter who was perhaps most admired by connoisseurs of the time, including the great collector the Duque de Lerma himself. One was a Pietà with a foreshortened Christ, a work which was “very highly esteemed” (“de grandissima estima”), and which hung in the oratory (no. 18). Another “much esteemed” painting in the oratory was a nocturnal Descent from the Cross attributed to Titian (no. 34). The subject matter of a further “famous” Titian nocturne was unspecified (no. 9). The most commonly used qualitative adjective in the document is that a picture is “rica pintura” or rich painting, most likely a metaphor that distinguished high-quality works in the collection. In a more literal sense, however, it may have denoted “richness” of color, of detail and figural incident, or even of the amount of gilding found on the frame, with the possible connotation of high value. At least two other pictures were described as “famous painting” (no. 45), and a genre piece of a woman in a kitchen as “very great painting” (no. 89).

Ramírez de Arellano chose the gallery as the site to display his mythological subjects. A set of paintings represented Apollo and the Nine Muses (no. 88), a subject that was also represented in the contemporary collection of the Duque de Lerma. The paintings are also reminiscent of another set of paintings of Apollo and the Muses painted by Juan Bautista Mayno before 1613, mentioned in 1620 in the Toledan study of Francisco de Rojas y Guzmán.<sup>3</sup> Some of Ramírez de Arellano’s mythologies depicted female nude goddesses; there were seven “fables of nude goddesses” (no. 106) and a painting of a nude, sleeping Venus being discovered by a satyr (no. 82). Other paintings may also have included representations of female and male nudes, such as an old painting of the story of Adonis (no. 96), the Abduction of Ganymede (no. 84), a painting of nymphs (no. 83), and, of course, a large painting of Adam and Eve (no. 79). One unusual painting was described as a “fable of mad love (with) an old man making love to a nude woman” (no. 99), which perhaps represented folly in old age, which had some special significance for this collector. The gallery also displayed Ramírez de Arellano’s sole example of the relatively novel genre of still life, a small painting of grapes, wine, bread, and a pie (no. 87), a small comic genre painting “which is laughter painted” (no. 90), and the above mentioned genre painting of a woman at a stall or in a kitchen (no. 89). The fact that he should own individual examples of still life and genre scenes is consistent with the collections of his noble peers, the most distinguished of which was that of the Duque de Lerma.

At the time of his death, Gaspar de Ledesma Meriño (d. 21 January 1618) was entitled a jurado of Baeza, which meant that he was a member of the governing municipal council (consejo) of that town. Eight days after Ledesma Meriño's death, his widow, Lucia Gentil, drew up an inventory of their goods in Madrid, which included his extensive library, and had the estate valued. Two painters were nominated to appraise the picture collection, the licenciado Juan de Roelas and Angelo Nardi. This was undertaken in three sessions on 27 April, 7 May, and 3 June 1618, with the values assigned in Roman numerals. The appraisal of 27 April comprised paintings which Ledesma Meriño owned at court, while the pictures appraised in the following sessions of 7 May and 3 June had been brought from Baeza, where he had the bulk of his collection. One of the reasons that Nardi could have been chosen to value the collection was that Ledesma had patronized the artist. In the accounts of the estate of the deceased, his widow paid Nardi a balance of 100 reales on "some paintings which he had made (Ledesma) in his lifetime".<sup>1</sup> Nardi and Roelas also bought gold and silver items at Ledesma's estate auction, where Nardi also acquired some clothing.

Ledesma Meriño's collection included his own portrait (no. 25) and apparently, his coat of arms (nos. 24 and 60). Among the few attributed paintings in the appraisal, there were two pictures of Noah's Ark by the Bassani (nos. 22), as well as an image of Christ copied after an unspecified Bassano (no. 32). One of the most important paintings in the collection was a small and valuable Resurrected Christ by Gaspar Becerra (1520–ca. 1568–70) (no. 29), who worked in Rome ca. 1545–1557 and brought the innovations of Michelangelo to Spain. Only two contemporary Spanish artists were cited by name: Juan de la Corte, by whom there was a battle picture (no. 47), and Pedro de Orrente, who had painted one of the landscapes (no. 46). Two other landscapes in the collection were by the famous Netherlandish specialist active in Rome, Paul Bril (nos. 45 and 51), one of which was a copy.

Ledesma Meriño's collection of paintings included mythological subjects, which perhaps reflected an earlier humanist taste of the sixteenth century. An unidentified "fable" was said to be by Parmigianino (no. 35), and there was a painting of "the Leda" (no. 23), as well as another bust-length painting of Leda (no. 53). Two paintings on canvas "which are called friezes of foliage" (no. 59) may have been examples of decorative pictures with fruit, flowers, and birds deriving from the tradition of grotesque painting revived in the sixteenth century.

Most remarkable of all, the appraisal listed one of Ledesma Meriño's own paintings of a head of Christ (no. 66). This is proof that this cultivated individual was not only a collector of paintings but himself an amateur artist. His interest in the practice of painting may also help to explain the collection of drawings and prints he owned, although these too would have appealed to a bibliophile with an interest in the visual arts such as Ledesma. Most of the unattributed drawings have not been included in the transcription here, but see for example, a drawing after Raphael (no. 80).

Remarkably, the authors of some of the drawings in the collection were named. The most highly prized works appear to have been three drawings by Gaspar Becerra, who was also a native of Ledesma Meriño's home town of Baeza and the author of his Resurrected Christ, cited above. Fragments of Becerra's drawings for frescoes in Philip II's royal chamber in the Madrid Alcázar and El Pardo, which have survived in the collections of the library of the monastery of the Escorial, remain as a precious testimony to the appreciation among connoisseurs of his abilities as a draughtsman.<sup>2</sup> Carducho spoke of a friend showing him some drawings by Becerra, an experience which was for him doubly enjoyable, and in which his admiration for "aquellos perfiles tan airosos, tan fundados en arte y ciencia, y tan cunplidos en todo" was equaled only by his sadness that artists of his own day did not imitate them.<sup>3</sup> Two of Ledesma Meriño's drawings by Becerra represented the god Mercury (nos. 70 and 71) and one of Diana (no. 72). The Mercury drawings may have been preparatory studies for Becerra's Perseus frescoes in the Queen's Tower of the El Pardo palace which were painted in 1563, and one of them may even have been the modello of Mercury that the artist showed to Philip II, as recounted in Palomino.<sup>4</sup> The depth of admiration for Becerra among connoisseurs is reflected in accounts of his life in Carducho,<sup>5</sup> Díaz del Valle,<sup>6</sup> and Palomino.

The values of Ledesma Meriño's Becerra drawings were appreciably higher than two drawings of St. Lawrence (no. 78) and the Massacre of the Innocents (no. 79) by an artist called "Bacho," referring to the Florentine Baccio Bandinelli.<sup>7</sup> A portrait drawing of the Duque del Infantado (no. 84) was said to have been drawn by Philip II's royal painter Rómulo Cincinnato (ca. 1540–97), who painted an extensive series of frescoes in the Infantado palace at Guadalajara in 1591 and who also worked at the Escorial. Worth least of all was the drawing of two Apostles by Juan Fernández de Navarrete (no. 74), which was most probably a preparatory study for his altarpieces in the basilica of the Escorial, and may have been colored, since it was described as "a piece of paper with the painting (pintura) of two apostles". A drawing of Fortitude (which is not included in the following transcription) was anonymous in the valuation, but could be connected with Francisco de Urbino's preparatory drawings for allegories that he painted in the prior's lower cell of the Escorial in 1581. A drawing of this subject by Urbino exists in the Escorial library.<sup>8</sup> Four drawings (traças) of the Escorial (not transcribed here) further suggest that Ledesma Meriño had access to the studios of artists who worked at the building. Perhaps his drawing of an altarpiece with its custodia (no. 77) was a study for the high altar of the basilica.

Ledesma Meriño's entire collection of paintings was sold at the public sale of his goods, which opened on 2 May 1618. Among the collectors buying pictures was Don Jerónimo Zapata de Villafuerte, whom Carducho<sup>9</sup> listed among the most important collectors at court, and the silversmith Andrés de Villarroel, whose collection is included below (Doc. 62). Villafuerte bought two of the most important pictures from the collection, the small panel of the Risen Christ by Gaspar Becerra (no. 29) on 8 May and a mythological subject attributed to Parmigianino (no. 35) at the following day's sale. On 28 September he bought the first of the drawings of Mercury by Becerra listed in the appraisal (no. 70). Villarroel bought paintings of Jacob's Dream (no. 39), Emmaus (no. 19 or 40), David (no. 44), and a landscape with a hermit (no. 38), the last painting probably the landscape copied after Paul Bril which was inventoried in Villarroel's collection in 1656 (Doc. 62, no. 4).

The combined inventory and appraisal of the estate of Don Francisco de Brizuela y Cárdenas, a knight of the Order of Santiago, Cavallero de la Reina and Corregidor de la Villa de Madrid, was drawn up by his widow, Catalina de Chaves Bañuelos, beginning on 2 October 1630. No artist was cited as having valued the small collection of paintings, which comprised 59 items.

Brizuela was a courtier attached to the queen's household, and an important part of his collection consisted of images of the Habsburgs, including the Spanish kings and their queens (nos. 42–47) and the French royal family. There were also portraits of Philip III's privado, the Duque de Lerma (no. 34), the Archbishop of Toledo, García de Loaysa (no. 39), and famous historical figures, such as the Duque de Alba (no. 32) and El Cid (no. 33). Given Brizuela's capacity as corregidor of the city of Madrid, it is not surprising that he should own images of the city itself (no. 49) and the Plaza Mayor (no. 48), as well as a view of Toledo (no. 23).

While 32 of the paintings in the collection represented religious subjects, three mythological subjects also appeared: two of these were copies after Titian's poesie in the Spanish royal collection, Danae and the shower of gold (no. 14), and Perseus and Andromeda (no. 15). A further painting of Diana bathing (no. 18) may also have derived from Titian's Diana and Actaeon in the Alcázar collections. One of the most intriguing subjects of all, however, was the painting of the classical artist Apelles (no. 20), the favorite painter of Alexander, a subject that would seem to reflect this collector's real appreciation of the liberal art of painting. This subject reappeared in the collection of Don Rodrigo de Herrera (Doc. 33, no. 34).

During the reign of Philip III, Agustín de Villanueva had risen from his position of royal secretary to become Protonotario de los Reinos de Aragón and a royal councilor. His postmortem inventory, begun in Madrid on 16 December 1620, was drawn up by his son, D. Jerónimo de Villanueva, who inherited his father's offices.

Villanueva's picture collection was appraised by Antonio Rizzi on 16 December 1620. It was made up of religious subjects, mostly of saints and devotional images of Christ and the Virgin. Many were small images painted on copper, panel, jasper, and illuminations on parchment, and there were a number of reliquaries, all of which were from Villanueva's oratory, as specified in the inventory following entry no. 53. Two small paintings on copper were considered precious enough to the owner to be covered with a curtain (nos. 15, 18). Villanueva's devout taste is reflected in the high percentage of religious subjects and his single mythology (no. 42).

The portrait collection included those of Philip II and Prince Philip (III), and no less than three portraits of Cardinal Granvelle (1517–1586) (nos. 62, 70), which reflect Villanueva's admiration for this most trusted minister of Philip II. The collection also included portraits of Villanueva himself and his wife Ana Díaz de Villegas Polanco, the higher value of the painting of his wife perhaps owing to the greater amount of labor expended in painting an elaborate costume (nos. 60, 61). Many of these pictures were listed in the earlier appraisal made of Villanueva's collection on the death of his wife by Antonio Rizzi on 6 October 1610.<sup>1</sup> The collection remained all but unchanged between 1610 and 1620, when it was inherited by his son Jerónimo, whose pictures were inventoried on his death in 1653 (Doc. 59).

Although none of Villanueva's paintings were attributed in any of the documents, one picture listed as a Portrait of the Marqués del Vasto was no doubt a copy of a famous Titian from the Spanish royal collection, taken to England by Charles, Prince of Wales, in 1623 and now in the Louvre.<sup>2</sup> In 1610, Villanueva's painting was listed as an Allegory of Chastity with a Portrait of Don Fernando de Gonzaga.<sup>3</sup> The lengthy description of the painting in the document of 1620 is consistent with this interpretation. The original, which enjoyed considerable fame even after it had left Madrid, is described by Carducho in 1633.<sup>4</sup> A copy painted before 1614 was listed in the studio inventory of the royal painter Bartolomé González in 1627, in which the prototype was called by its familiar title of "la bola de Ticiano".<sup>5</sup>

Like the collection of Gil Ramírez de Arellano (Doc. 3), Villanueva's collection included a single example of both a still life and a genre painting. The description of the still life, consisting of a partridge and other birds, a cardoon, and fruit (no. 64) calls to mind early Spanish paintings by Juan van der Hamen and Juan Sánchez Cotán, such as his Still Life with Game Fowl, Fruit and Cardoon signed and dated in 1602 in the Prado, Madrid. Villanueva acquired the painting after September 1610, as the work is not listed in the inventory drawn up on his wife's death. His more valuable genre painting was listed as "un lienzo de un Bodegon grande al olio de frutas".<sup>6</sup> Worth 400 reales in 1610, this had fallen a little in value a decade later, when it was described as a female fruitseller peeling a peach (no. 65).

The contemporary folio pagination was assigned slightly out of order. Folio 750 (recto and verso) appears between f. 748v and f. 749. However, the actual order of the inventory has been adhered to in the following transcription.

Alonso Fernández de Córdoba, Marqués de Celada

Inventory/valuation of Alonso Fernández de Córdoba, Marqués de Celada,<sup>1</sup> who died just five years after his wife (for her postmortem inventory, see Document 2). A number of the same paintings listed in the earlier document are found here, but altogether the size of the collection had apparently diminished in the meantime, and just 31 items of value are listed. Moreover, the valuations had decreased markedly. A Madonna with the Sleeping Christ Child, valued at 400 reales in 1617, was valued on this occasion at 300 reales, but other reductions were more drastic, such as the depiction of Mary Magdalene in the Desert that was reduced from 330 to just 50 reales. The View of Venice, now specified as a view of the Piazza San Marco, fell from 300 to 100 reales. Only the portrait of the deceased Marquesa retained its earlier value at 500 reales. The reason for these changes is not known.

On the death of Isabel de Leguizamón, her son Don Pedro Ibañez de Leguizamón requested that the paintings and objects with which his mother had appointed her oratory be incorporated into the Leguizamón mayorazgo to which he was the heir. Therefore an inventory of the oratory was drawn up by him and entailed to the estate.

The inventory of the nine images from the oratory was headed by the two most important paintings by Luis de Morales (nos. 1, 2), and also included three pictures painted in Rome (nos. 4, 6, and 9). An Ascension of Christ (no. 3) was embroidered, and matched the subject of one of the Roman paintings (no. 6). However, the most remarkable and unusual feature of this inventory is the detailed description of the two paintings by Morales of the Ecce Homo and Christ Carrying the Cross. Morales' highly finished and detailed images of Christ were the focus for meditations on the Passion during private devotion. It seems that here too the notary has been stimulated by the visual intensity of these images to provide an extremely detailed record, one which is sensitive to the pathos of the images but which retains all the objectivity of a legal document. He was not as attentive to the other paintings in the collection. The description of the frames of the paintings by Morales, and the inscriptions on the frame of the Christ Carrying the Cross, also provide important near-contemporary evidence for the ways in which such works were presented.

In contrast to the broader art-historical interest of the 1601 Infantado inventory (Document 1, above), the Infantado inventories of the 1620s are of use in documenting the period before the collection was merged with that of the Pastrana.

The embassy of Don Ruy Gómez de Silva de Mendoza y de la Cerda, Duque de Pastrana, Príncipe de Melito y de Eboli in Rome from 1623 to 1626, has been analyzed in the Introduction. Sometime around 1638–39, Don Ruy Gómez's son, Don Rodrigo de Silva y Mendoza, Duque de Pastrana from 1626, married Doña Catalina Gómez de Sandoval y Mendoza, who had been Duquesa del Infantado from 1633. Their son, Don Gregorio de Silva Medoza y Sandoval (22 May 1640–10 November 1693) was consequently Duque de Pastrana y de Estremera, Príncipe de Melito y de Eboli, and Conde de Saldaña from the death of his father in 1675, and Duque del Infantado (Lerma, Mandas), Marqués de Santillana y del Cenete from the death of his mother, which presumably occurred in the late 1670s or 1680s, but certainly before April 1690, when her daughter-in-law made a will under the titles of both houses. (Don Gregorio entered the Order of Santiago in 1666 – perhaps the occasion celebrated in Carreno's portrait, now at the Prado, no. 650 – and received the Toison d'Or on 11 May 1693.) Thus were the collections of the houses of Infantado and Pastrana united.

Unfortunately, the Infantado inventory of Doña Catalina Gómez de Sandoval y Mendoza, presumably taken between 1675 and 1690, has not been located, and the Pastrana inventory of Don Rodrigo de Silva y Mendoza, taken in 1676, is nearly devoid of attributions, except for two portraits by Sánchez Coello. As a result, we have little information on the combined collection at a critical point in its history. (It is not until 1737 that we encounter another inventory.)

The will relating to the estate of Don Juan Hurtado de Mendoza de la Vega y Luna (Alcántara), 6th Duque [Consort] del Infantado, Duque de Mandas, Marqués de Cenete, Marqués de Santillana, Mayordomo Mayor del Rey, Gentleman to the King's Bedchamber, Member of the Councils of State and War was certified posthumously on 26 November 1624, Don Juan having died on 1 August 1624.

The inventory was taken beginning 3 August 1624 by the Duquesa, Ana de Mendoza de la Vega y Luna, who held all the titles (e.g., 6th Duquesa del Infantado, Marquesa de Santillana del Mar, Marquesa del Cenete, de Arquiso, de Campos) except Mandas in her own right (cf. f. 1442). Included are tapestries (ff. 1044–47), paintings (ff. 1110v–1159v, 21–27 August 1624), and religious images (or ensembles) in painting and sculpture (ff. 1204–16, 24 September 1624), with those belonging to the duquesa listed in a separate category. Some of the imágenes are said to be painted on canvas, some on panel or other two-dimensional media; others may have been painted reliefs, of polychromed wood. Since these objects did not form part of Don Juan's personal collection, they seem not to have been included in the valuation. A number of other paintings were inventoried as addenda after the inventory was already under way (ff. 1209–10, 1215v–1216v; 21 October 1624).

The valuation was begun in September 1624 in preparation for an almoneda. The paintings were appraised (ff. 1274–97) by Juan de la Corte and Matías Jiménez on 2–4 September 1624. There were 439 numbered lots, followed by tapestries (ff. 1044–1047); a number of the pictures were marked “no se vende” in the margin. Sculpture and objets d'art are appraised by Luis de Espinas and Jacques Mayer, plateros (ff. 1335–40, nos. 845–908).

Miscellaneous pictures, and almost all of the objects belonging to the Duquesa Doña Ana in her own right, were removed from consideration before the appraisal.<sup>1</sup> The various sections of the inventory are careful to distinguish among works inherited by Doña Ana from the Infantado patrimony, objects bought by her “with her own money,” and objects bought or inherited by Don Juan during the marriage. The paintings section also distinguishes between what the previous Duque del Infantado, Don Iñigo, left and what Don Juan bought or inherited from other sources in his own right.

1. The present document, AHPM, Prot. 2.674, contains in-folios (f. 1412 bis) with valuations for selected items in the estate of Don Juan Hurtado de Mendoza de la Vega y Luna, Duque de Mandas and 6th Duque [Consort] del Infantado, as inventoried in AHPM, Prot. 2673, ff. 1497ff. (Getty Provenance Index No. E-48).

1628

Doña Catalina de Zúñiga y Sandoval, Condesa de Lemos (d. 8 February 1628) was the widow of Fernando Ruiz de Castro, 6th Conde de Lemos and Viceroy of Naples from 1599 until his death on 19 October 1601.<sup>1</sup> She was the sister of Philip III's valido Francisco Gómez de Sandoval y Rojas, Duque de Lerma. After the death of Lerma's wife in 1603, he maintained control of the queen's household, a potential focus of political opposition, through his sister, who was camarera mayor of Queen Margarita. The condesa's political influence with her brother, as well as her great piety, was acknowledged by the Duke of Mantua and Grand Duke of Tuscany, who sent her valuable devotional objects for her oratory in 1603.<sup>2</sup>

Fernando Ruiz de Castro had been Viceroy of Naples from 1599 until his death, as was his son Pedro Fernández de Castro, 7th Conde de Lemos, between 1610 and 1616. His family connection with Italy may have been important in the supply of Italian art to the Lerma clan in Spain. For instance, it was most probably the 7th Conde de Lemos, acting Viceroy of Naples between 1601–1603, who was responsible for sending to his nephew the Duque de Lerma an excellent copy of Raphael's Madonna of the Fish (Madrid, Prado), then in San Domenico, Naples.<sup>3</sup> It was probably the 7th Conde de Lemos (d. 1622) whom Carducho referred to among the prominent art collectors at the Spanish court in 1633.<sup>4</sup> (The only known inventory of the latter's paintings is that drawn up in 1648 on the death of his widow Catalina de la Cerda y Sandoval.)<sup>5</sup>

The notarized inventory of the estate of the Condesa de Lemos was begun in Madrid on 19 February 1628. This document helps to clarify a somewhat confusing list of paintings from the Lemos estate published by the Duque de Berwick y de Alba.<sup>6</sup> The fact that the attributions were exclusively to Italian artists (in addition to Dürer and Bosch) indicates a distinct bias in the family's taste. The earliest Italian picture listed was a Virgin and Child, attributed to either Mantegna or Giovanni Bellini (no. 66). The most famous Italian masters of the High Renaissance i.e. Raphael, Leonardo, Correggio and Michelangelo, were represented in the collection by copies, a taste shared with the Duque de Lerma. The Lemos painting after Raphael's St. John in the Desert (no. 2) was a copy of the popular composition in Florence from Raphael's workshop, another copy of which Lerma acquired in 1603.<sup>7</sup> There was also a copy of Correggio's Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine (no. 1), one of many cited in Spanish inventories of this time period. The Michelangelo copy of a Holy Family (no. 51) was painted by one "Mateo de Marcelo," which may refer to Marcello Venusti. However, this may refer to the son of the Valladolid painter Gregorio Martínez called Marcello Martínez; paintings by both father and son decorated the Duque de Lerma's church of San Pablo, Valladolid.<sup>8</sup> (The Duque de Lerma gave a copy of another painting of the Holy Family described as "copia de Marcello" to the convent of San Pablo (Valladolid) in 1609.)<sup>9</sup> One of the three Raphael copies (nos. 2, 19, 52) depicting Christ with symbols of the Evangelist was valued at 350 ducats in 1629 and given to Miguel de Moscoso, Archbishop of Segovia.<sup>10</sup> Like Lerma, the condesa also owned Florentine works, and one of the most important was her large Penitent Magdalene by Bronzino, which served as the altarpiece in one of her oratories. There was also a copy of the miraculous thirteenth-century Annunciation from SS. Annunziata, Florence (no. 29), which was popular among collectors of Lerma's circle.<sup>11</sup> Lerma's own copy was painted in 1603 by Alessandro Allori, and the copy by Allori that exists at the Escorial was made for Philip II in 1585.<sup>12</sup> Lerma and his sister may also have exchanged pictures, and the condesa had given him a life-sized Christ for his cell at Lerma.<sup>13</sup> Lerma owned a portrait of his sister painted by Alonso Sánchez Coello.<sup>14</sup>

A widow from 1601, the Condesa de Lemos appears to have been extremely pious, and this is reflected in the predominantly religious nature of her collection of paintings, the majority of which decorated her oratory. The lack of Venetian art was unusual for a noble collection of this time, and there was only a single religious painting by the Bassani listed in the collection (no. 44). A Virgin and Child by Scipione Gaetano (no. 28) might exemplify the piety that was characteristic of the condesa's taste. The collection also included a large work of Mary Magdalene Searching for Christ in the Sepulchre by "Procachino," perhaps Giulio Cesare Procaccini. Apart from portraits, the only profane subjects listed were landscapes, some with genre scenes which a later inventory of 1648 attributed to Paul Bril and Jan Brueghel.<sup>15</sup> No still lifes were listed in the collection, but a painting of a skull (no. 37) represented an older Vanitas tradition.

Another modern Italian painting in the collection was a large Saint Christopher with the Christ Child by Orazio Borgianni (no. 129), which is perhaps identifiable with a version in the Milicua collection in Barcelona.<sup>16</sup> Borgianni visited Spain and found favor with the Lerma group, and he was also protected by 7th Conde de Lemos during his viceroyship of Naples between 1610–1616.<sup>17</sup> Indeed, a copy of a Borgianni painting of the Agony in the Garden in the collection of Doctor Juan de Matute (Doc. 14, no. 16) was given to Lemos, who was said to value it at 1,000 ducats.

11. Schroth, 1990, p. 67 suggests that Lemos' picture was a copy after Fra Angelico's Annunciation (Madrid, Prado) which Lerma received in 1611. This seems unlikely.

Juan de Mendoza,
Marqués de San Germán and Marqués de la Hinojosa 1628

Juan de Mendoza (d. 24 February 1628) was an important minister of the reign of Philip III, and owed his position entirely to his family connections to the ruling faction of the valido, the Duque de Lerma. Mendoza was cousin of the Duque de Lerma and nephew of Bernardo de Sandoval y Rojas, Archbishop of Toledo. As Marqués de San Germán, Mendoza began his career as Gentilhombre de la Cámara del Rey (1599) and was made Marqués de la Hinojosa in 1612.<sup>1</sup> He was son of Don Juan de Mendoza, the general of the Spanish fleet, and also pursued a military career, serving under Lerma in the Spanish cavalry and receiving an appointment to the Council of War in 1605. In 1607, he was made capitán general of naval artillery, and his private collection included a painting of his entry into the port of San Sebastián in this capacity (no. 34), as well as paintings of Spanish ports (nos. 46, 50). He not only survived the change of regime on Lerma's fall, but also went on to become the confidante of the Conde-Duque de Olivares, and ambassador to England in 1623.<sup>2</sup>

Hinojosa served in Italy as governor of Milan from 1612 until his recall in disgrace in 1615, when he was appointed to the Consejo de Estado.<sup>3</sup> Despite his political and military failure in Italy, his postmortem inventory in Madrid in 1628 listed a series of ten pictures commemorating his military exploits against the Duchy of Savoy in 1615 (nos. 32 and 33). He may even have presented the Duque de Lerma with a set of six of these paintings, which were hung in the public gallery at Lerma by 1617.<sup>4</sup> Hinojosa's collection also included a painting of his capture of the African port of Larache in 1610 (no. 49), as well as two portraits of himself (nos. 45, 67). In having such self-aggrandizing paintings made, Hinojosa was probably following the precedent of Lerma himself, who, ever conscious of the need to glorify his family, had commissioned a painting in 1606 from Vicencio Carducho of the Siege of Antequera by his illustrious military predecessor, Diego Gómez de Sandoval.<sup>5</sup> To these can be added a parallel example of the collection of another soldier, Don Lope de Hoçes y Córdoba, who owned autobiographical military paintings of his own campaigns that are listed in his inventory of 1645<sup>6</sup> and exist today in the Prado.

Although Hinojosa was fully aware of the value of paintings to manifest power and status, from the evidence of his inventory, at least, it is probably true to say that he was less interested in collecting pictures for aesthetic enjoyment than other members of his clan. Apart from the paintings directly relating to his own military career, Hinojosa's collection consisted mostly of religious subjects, portraits, and landscapes. There were various series of portraits (no. 40), hermit saints (no. 18), and a set of miracles of St. Charles Borromeo (no. 19), which were perhaps copies of paintings in the Duomo of Milan, as were those that his cousin, the Duque de Lerma, donated to San Blas, Valladolid.<sup>7</sup> In 1626 Cassiano dal Pozzo had visited the palace of the Marqueses de la Hinojosa, where he had admired the quality of paintings in the oratory, including three works by the Milanese artist Cerano, and paintings by Artemesia Gentileschi and Vouet.<sup>8</sup> A number of Hinojosa's paintings also reflect an interest in Spain's South American colonies (nos. 35, 47, 48).

A set of 12 months may have been paintings of above-average aesthetic merit, and may be identifiable with 12 landscapes on panel worth 40 ducats each listed among the pictures of Ana María de Mendoza, Marquesa de la Hinojosa, on her death in 1642.<sup>9</sup> Hinojosa owned portraits of Italian women (nos. 36, 40, 42, 43), and some of his pictures were probably acquired during his viceroyalty in Milan. He owned two still lifes, one of some partridges on a tray (no. 41) and another of grapes and peaches on a tray (nos. 30), whose descriptions recall early Lombard pictures by Ambrogio Figino and Panfilo Nuvolone and which may have been brought to court as souvenirs of his residence in Italy. Hinojosa's still life with grapes and peaches could have been a version of a still life by Nuvolone dated 1620 in a private collection in Milan.<sup>10</sup>

Don Juan Manuel de Mendoza y Luna, 3rd Marqués de Montesclaros, Marqués de Castil de Bayela (1571–1628) was a member of the Mendoza family, headed by the Duques del Infantado, whose principal seat was at Guadalajara.<sup>1</sup> In 1600 he was made asistente of Seville. He was Viceroy of Mexico between 1603–1607, when the Sevillian artist Alonso Vázquez traveled in his entourage, and Viceroy of Peru 1607–1616. Montesclaros rose to prominence and influence in the early years of the reign of Philip IV, protected by the Conde-Duque de Olivares, appointed to the Councils of State and War, President of the Council of Finance (Hacienda y Contaduría) between 1623–1626, as well as President of the Council of Aragón, and enjoying the title of gentilhombre de la cámara del Rey.

The postmortem inventory of the estate of the Marqués de Montesclaros was begun in Madrid in his houses on the Plazuela de Matute on 9 October 1628,<sup>2</sup> including his large library, picture collection and oratory inventoried between 19–23 October.<sup>3</sup> Montesclaros had probably formed his collection after his return to Spain in 1616; it was appraised for sale between 28–30 November 1628 by the establishment painters Vicencio Carducho and Antonio de Monreal, who did not attribute any of the works they saw. The disposal of Montesclaros' moveable goods by public auction began on 17 November (ff. 460–606), and attracted noble and common purchasers alike. Among these were the Marqués de Oropesa (who bought nos. 9, 11, 12) and Don Antonio de Moscoso (nos. 17, 22, 40, 41, 44–50, 57, 58, 60, 61). One of the most distinguished collectors of paintings who bought at the sale was the Duque de Medina de las Torres, who acquired six paintings (nos. 1, 3, 4, 7, 35), although these were not listed in his postmortem inventory of 1668 and had perhaps been sold or given away in his lifetime.<sup>4</sup> The connoisseur and amateur painter praised by Carducho in 1633, Jerónimo de Villafuerte, Guardajoyas of the king, bought a painting by Bassano (no. 14).<sup>5</sup>

The Marqués de Montesclaros has earned a special place in history of Spanish painting as one of the private patrons of Velázquez during his early years at court, from whom he commissioned a portrait of the Conde-Duque de Olivares, miniatures of Olivares and Philip IV for a venera pendant, and portraits of himself and his wife.<sup>6</sup> The inventory and valuation list the full-length portrait of Olivares (no. 63), and another smaller painting (no. 64), that of the Marquesa (no. 76), and two of Montesclaros himself, an unframed full-length and a framed half-length (no. 75), which, at this time, were still unfinished. In the mid-1620s, a combination of ambition and financial embarrassment moved Montesclaros into the Olivares camp and by 1626 he had become one of the most fervent supporters of the Conde-Duque and his policies.<sup>7</sup> The commission of portraits of Olivares from Velázquez would have flattered his protector and was a gesture of political allegiance, since loyal ministers were expected to own “official” portraits of the king, the royal family, and his favorite. Montesclaros' collection of state portraits included full-lengths of the Duque de Uceda, the previous válido between 1618–21, and his wife, as well as a set of 23 dynastic portraits of the Habsburg royal family. While Velázquez and his studio enjoyed a monopoly in respect to portraits of Philip IV, and possibly of Olivares too, sets of images of Habsburg royals, so common in courtly collections, were the specialty of the royal portraitist Bartolomé González.

Some 205 paintings were listed in Montesclaros' collection. The appraisal distinguished profane subject matter from religious paintings, called “Pinturas de devoción” (no. 80ff). Some of the latter were undoubtedly “gallery pictures” that had probably hung in the main rooms of the house, while others were from the oratory (nos. 98–111). The accounts of Montesclaros' estate mention a payment of 4,216 reales to Carducho for paintings of angels, which the marqués gave to his daughter, the Duquesa del Infantado.<sup>8</sup>

Unfortunately, however, the only attributed pictures in Montesclaros' collection were four paintings of the Story of Noah by the Bassani (no. 14). Cassiano dal Pozzo visited the Montesclaros palace while at Madrid with the papal legation in 1626 and, although he remarked on the large number of paintings, he mentioned the subjects of only three, one of which was a painting of the famous Spanish victory over the Dutch at Bahía de Todos los Santos in Brazil in 1625.<sup>9</sup> This much-celebrated victory was depicted by Juan Bautista Mayno in a painting in the Salón de los Reinos of the Buen Retiro, Prado and the subject was an appropriate painting for a former South-American viceroy and militant Councilor of State who had vociferously supported a tax to pay for the Spanish fleet whose home port was at Bahía. This was not listed in Montesclaros' inventory, although paintings of natives (nos. 70, 77) and the port of Callão in Peru (no. 78) reflected his years of foreign service in the Indies. There was also a painting of the native king of the island of Ternate (no. 69), one of the vital spice-producing Indonesian Islas Molucas, occupied by Spain in 1606.

The other paintings noticed by Cassiano in the Montesclaros palace were a pair of Flemish still lifes bought from the auction of the celebrated collection of Don Rodrigo de Calderón.<sup>10</sup> Large, flamboyant Flemish still lifes by Frans Snyders enjoyed great popularity among Spanish noble collectors, and the pair that excited Cassiano's admiration were in fact the centerpiece of Montesclaros' collection. At 7,700 reales, these were the most highly valued paintings in the appraisal of Vicencio Carducho (no. 8). While Carducho was an artist and theoretician who regarded still life as a minor genre of painting, he must also have been well aware of the esteem and value of such works on the Spanish market and assigned them a high value. They were the most expensive paintings sold at Montesclaros' estate auction, where they were acquired by the Genoese merchant-banker Pablo Justiniano for 5,500 reales. Since the pictures were not listed in Justiniano's own postmortem inventory of 1634 (Doc. 19), they may have been sold on or possibly shipped back to Genoa before his death.

Justiniano's inventory, however, does allow us to attribute two anonymous paintings from Montesclaros' collection to a specific artist. On 24 March 1629, Justiniano bought two large paintings (210 x 336 cm.) depicting the Burning of Troy with the Trojan Horse and the Banquet of Dido and Aeneas (nos. 5, 6) for 1,000 and 1,400 reales, respectively. In his postmortem inventory of 1634, these pictures were inventoried as by Juan de la Corte, the latter painting being called a Banquet of Anthony and Cleopatra (see Doc. 19, nos. 27, 28). Montesclaros owned another version of this subject, painted on panel and paired with a Feast of Belshazzar (no. 18). The inventory and valuation give no clues as to the authorship of these, nor Montesclaros' other valuable mythological paintings (nos. 3, 4, 20, 34, 35). A change in the entry suggests that the painting of the story of Actaeon (no. 3) actually represented Marsyas. The large painting of Hercules fighting with the Nemean lion (no. 34) is an interesting precedent in a court collection for Francisco de Zurbarán's Hercules series of 1634 for the Salón de los Reinos. This painting was sold to Pablo Justiniano for 1,100 reales and was listed in his inventory in 1634 (Doc. 19, no. 29). Montesclaros owned two paintings with female nudes, a Lucretia (no. 17) and an unspecified "fable" (no. 20) that seems to represent the theme of Sacred and Profane Love.

Doctor Juan de Matute, canon of Granada cathedral, died on 8 January 1629, while on business in Madrid. When he fell ill at the end of December 1628, he drew up a last will and testament and included in the document a record (memoria) of a few possessions in Madrid (ff. 9–10v, 11 December) and, more importantly, an inventory of his estate in Granada (ff. 11–16v, 22 December 1628) written in his own hand. The remarkable and vivid holograph inventory included Matute's collection of pictures (ff. 13–14v), some of which were housed in Granada (nos. 1–23, 30–33) and others outside the city at Pulianas (nos. 24–29). A series of paintings of hermits were divided between the two properties (no. 8). Matute's paintings are listed in considerable detail in the document, and their owner sometimes mentions their history and value, even occasionally freely expressing his personal opinions and enthusiasm about their quality. The works are qualified as "soberana" (no. 2), "extraordinaria" (nos. 6, 7), "muy alta" (no. 14), and "valiente" (nos. 15, 16).

Matute's paintings by Andrea del Sarto (nos. 15, 19), as well as copies after Sarto (nos. 11, 12) suggest that he had connections with Florence. It is clear from Matute's comments, however, that he had lived in Rome, probably attached to the papal court, where he had acquired some of his pictures. Indeed, his own portrait (no. 22), painted by Ottavio Leoni and depicting Matute holding a document addressed to the Pope, was a painting that he himself qualified as "a very great work". A large Immaculate Conception (no. 5) which Matute had made into an altarpiece had been copied from a smaller prototype in Rome. A set of 12 paintings of Thebaid hermits in beautiful landscapes (no. 8) had been bought in Rome, where the canvases alone had cost 10 ducats; and seven paintings of the Creation (no. 23) had cost 12 ducats each in Rome. Two works, St. Francis Receiving the Stigmata and St. Anthony of "Paula" were painted by the currently unidentified painter "Casto foix," who is called "a great Flemish painter of Rome" (nos. 9–10).

Matute also reveals his knowledge of at least one important Roman picture collection in specifying that his copy of St. John the Baptist with a Lamb (no. 13) was from the famous painting owned by the Mattei family. (Given the controversy surrounding the identity of the figure in Caravaggio's painting now in the Capitoline Museum, Rome, it is worth noting that Matute believed it depicted St. John the Baptist.) He owned another large painting of his name saint, St. John the Baptist, in which the figure was said to be nude in the desert, embracing a lamb without horns (no. 17). It is intriguing to speculate on the possibility of a connection between Matute's copy of Caravaggio's St. John and Caravaggesque images of St. John the Baptist attributed to Juan Bautista del Mayno, an artist by whom he owned two works (nos. 2 and 14).<sup>1</sup>

The only Spanish artist identified in Matute's collection is Juan Bautista del Mayno (1578–1641), called "Juan Bautista Pastrana" after Pastrana, his town of birth (no. 14). Matute noted that Mayno was a Dominican monk – a fact of considerable interest to a collector who himself had taken religious orders – and also that he was Philip IV's painting master. The Mary Magdalene in the Desert by his hand, which Matute qualified as "very high painting," (no. 14) probably represented the figure in a landscape and may have been similar in type to his Penitent Magdalene in the Prado<sup>2</sup> or his signed St. John the Baptist in the Wilderness.<sup>3</sup>

Clearly very proud of his collection, Matute was not shy about recording the costs, value, and desirability of some of the paintings, perhaps with a degree of hyperbole. Thus, a small copper of the Immaculate Conception in an ebony frame and covered by a coloured taffeta curtain was said to be worth over 100 escudos (no. 4). Matute made the point that his painting of Belshazzar's Feast, worth more than 500 ducats, had been copied twice and that the owners of these copies, Don Juan de la Rea and Don Luis de Villaguituire, valued them at more than 1,000 ducats each (no. 6). A copy of his Agony in the Garden by Orazio Borgianni (no. 16) was given to the Conde de Lemos, who also valued it at 1,000 ducats. While these examples demonstrate the high regard in which good copies were held by collectors, the fact that Matute had been offered as much as 200 ducats for his Christ and the Virgin in half-length by Titian (no. 3) is adduced in the document almost as a “proof” of its authenticity as an original work.

By a document signed in Madrid on 17 November 1630, Don Martín de Saavedra Guzmán y Galindo, Gentilhombre del Serenísimo Príncipe Don Carlos (d.1632), and knight of the Order of Calatrava, borrowed 1,000 copper ducats and 4,551 silver reales from his father, Don Gonzalo de Saavedra, a citizen of Córdoba. Don Martín drew up an inventory of his goods (bienes muebles) that comprised his collection of paintings, furnishings, a reliquary, and marble statue of Christ and the Virgin, with some items of silver, all of which he sent to his father in Córdoba for safekeeping and which acted as security for the loan. Although the reason for raising the loan was given merely as “business and necessities,” it is not beyond the realm of possibility that Don Martín was intending to travel outside Spain. A portrait of the viceroy of Sicily, Prince Manuel Philibert of Savoy (1588–1624), in the collection (no. 34) suggests an Italian connection.

It is proof of the high regard in which the collection of paintings was held that this headed Don Martín's inventory and was a principal element in guaranteeing such a large loan of money. The fact that the owner himself drew up the list of his own pictures accounts for the high rate of attributions in this document. Although the paintings were not valued, in the case of originals the artists' names testified to their authenticity. Originals were distinguished from copies, and copies after named artists were probably works of quality. In the case of one anonymous Flemish painting (no. 28), it was affirmed that it was painted “de un flamenco baliante”. The inventory did not identify the hands of Spanish artists working at home, unless the picture of a man being bled by “Cardilo” (no. 23) represented a work by Vicencio Carducho. However, Jusepe de Ribera was represented by a copy after a painting of St. Bartholomew, although the document does not specify whether this depicted the saint alone or undergoing his martyrdom (no. 7). Another picture was copied from a Virgin by “su suegro del españoletto” (no. 21), which referred to Ribera's father-in-law the Sicilian painter Gian Bernardino Azzolino. A further Neapolitan connection is suggested by the cityscapes of Naples and Venice painted by an artist identified only as “monsieur de napoles” (no. 30), perhaps referring to Didier Barra (Monsú Desiderio), who was the foremost painter of vedute in Naples of the time.

Although this was a relatively small collection of paintings, a broad range of subject matters was represented. The landscapes with ruins (nos. 31, 32) bring to mind works painted in Rome by the colony of northern artists, among others. A number of subjects from classical mythology suggest a liberal, Italianate taste on the part of this collector (nos. 17, 35, 36). His sophistication did not, however, prevent him appreciating a small genre painting of a figure drinking (no. 26). The most remarkable aspect of this collection, however, is the presence of an original and four copies of paintings by Caravaggio. The St. Thomas, thought to be an original by Don Martín (no. 20), could have been a version of the Doubting Thomas painted for the Marchese Giustiniani (Potsdam, Sanssouci Bildergalerie). It is difficult to know which prototypes were behind the copies of St. Jerome (no. 16) and St. John (the Baptist) (no. 10), although the copy of St. Lucy (no. 5) may have been related to Caravaggio's late painting of the Burial of St. Lucy for the church of St. Lucy at Syracuse, Sicily. The Toothpuller (no. 24) was probably copied from the Caravaggesque painting of this subject now in the Palazzo Pitti, in Florence. Don Martín's taste was clearly for naturalistic paintings, the works of Caravaggio, the early Ribera, and even the painting by “Cardilo” (no. 23) which was expressly said to be “taken from nature”. This did not, however, stand in his way of his appreciation of the ideal style of Raphael, by whom he owned copies of a Virgin (no. 13) and, conversely, a Venus (no. 17).

The collection of paintings of the royal secretary Pedro Fernández de Navarrete (d. 13 March 1632) were valued in an appraisal by the Flemish painter and archero Phelipe Diriksen on 22 March 1632. Fernández de Navarrete was in the royal bureaucracy, and his collection included a set of portraits of the Spanish royal family (no. 45) as well as one of Philip III's privado, the Duque de Lerma (no. 18). He was also the author of a political treatise on the problems of the kingdom of Spain, Conservación de monarquías y discursos políticos sobre la gran consulta que el consejo hizo a D. Felipe Tercero (1626). His collection may have been formed some years before his death in 1632; the fact that it is made up entirely of portraits and images of religious subjects perhaps reflects the extremely pious atmosphere of the court during the latter part of the reign of Philip III. Although it is unusual that the collection contained no decorative subjects, such as still lifes and landscapes, it is worth noting that the predominance of religious narratives and devotional subjects would have been entirely typical of most collections formed by lower-ranking courtiers and non-noble individuals in the early seventeenth century. Two paintings were said to be by El Greco (nos. 7, 38) and there was a copy on copper of a Magdalene by Titian (no. 35), but while the values of some pictures were comparatively high, the vast majority were listed anonymously.

Doctor Alonso Cortés was Relator del Consejo y Cámara de Castilla, the body created by Philip II in 1588 as an accessory cabinet of ministers chosen from the Consejo de Castilla, with which the king could treat affairs more directly and on a more personal level. His postmortem inventory was drawn up by his widow Isabel Maldonado, beginning 10 April 1632, with his paintings inventoried between 13 and 14 April (ff. 32v–37v). The picture collection was appraised on 21 May 1632 by the royal painter Vicencio Carducho (ff. 157–164v). Carducho assigned high values to the paintings, which necessitated the reappraisal by the same artist on 7 June 1632 of a number at more realistic values reduced for their sale (ff. 165–170).

While the inventory of this collection contained no attributions to artists, Carducho's valuation identified the hands of seven artists, six of whom were Italian, while the last was a drawing of the Adoration of the Kings by Rubens (no. 87). Carducho was himself an Italian painter of Florentine extraction and had perhaps for that reason been called upon to appraise a collection that contained significant examples of Italian painting. A pair of paintings on copper were recognized as copies after Guido Reni (nos. 13–14). These were as valuable as a large St. Lawrence that Carducho evidently believed to be by Titian himself (no. 84). Two paintings of low valuation attributed to Bassano (nos. 52 and 70) are unlikely to have been originals. Carducho used his expertise to identify the authors of three other valuable paintings, all worth around 400 reales: a Visitation by Federico Barocci (no. 36), a Coronation of the Virgin by the short-lived Taddeo Zuccari (no. 37), and a Christ at the Column by the Cavalier d'Arpino (no. 26). The fact that these were all religious paintings reflects the overwhelmingly religious nature of Cortés' collection. It did, however, contain a number of portraits, including that of Cortés himself (no. 71). There were also some landscapes and still lifes in addition to a genre painting (no. 67), but the only mythological subjects identified were a picture of Cupid (no. 101) amid a small landscape with Pan and Syrinx (no. 91).

Vittoria Colonna,
Condesa de Módica and Duquesa de Medina de Río seco wife of the 8th Almirante de Castilla

1634

If one were to evaluate the relative status of Spanish Golden Age collections solely on the basis of contemporary reports, the collections of the Almirantes de Castilla (Duques de Medina de Río seco) and their wives, who were called the Duquesas de Medina de Río seco, would probably be considered the finest. If we were, on the other hand, to base our valuation solely on the documentation of the collection presented here – a body of data spanning nearly the entire seventeenth century – we would perhaps be less willing to displace the Carpios, Leganés, and the other leading collections of the age. This should serve as a warning about the limits of inventories as interpretive documents – we are clearly in the hands of the tasadores who made the appraisals, or of the heirs of the collector, who may or may not have preserved information about the authorship of the works. It should also temper our reliance on the hearsay of visitors' reports. Nevertheless, combining the reports with the documents, we may assert that the almirante's collection was among the best in the Golden Age.

With regard to the documents presented here, we may cite the following members of the Enríquez de Cabrera family active as collectors:

Doña Victoria Colonna, dowager Duquesa de Medina de Río seco, widow of the 8th Almirante de Castilla. Condesa de Modica (in her own right), who died 28 December 1633. She was the mother of D. Juan Alfonso Enríquez de Cabrera, 9th Almirante de Castilla. Her inventory (the present document) was taken at Madrid beginning 5 January 1634.

Don Juan Alfonso Enríquez de Cabrera, Duque de Medina de Río seco, 9th Almirante de Castilla, who was born in 1597 and died in 1647. Don Juan Alfonso was orphaned at the age of three; he thus came into possession of his estates in 1600. He served as Mayordomo Mayor to Philip IV in the 1630s, was appointed Viceroy of Sicily in 1641, and was Viceroy of Naples from 1644 to 1646. (See Doc. 43.)

Doña Luisa de Sandoval, widow of Don Juan Alfonso Enríquez de Cabrera, 9th Almirante de Castilla; she died in 1664. (See Doc. 74.)

Don Juan Gaspar Enríquez de Cabrera, Duque de Medina de Río seco, 10th Almirante de Castilla, who was born in 1625 and died before September 25, 1691. (See Doc. 117.)

Don Juan Thomas Enríquez de Cabrera, Duque de Medina de Río seco, 11th Almirante de Castilla, who opposed Philip V and fled to Portugal in 1702, and his brother, Don Luis Enríquez de Cabrera, Marqués de Alcañizas. Although the 11th almirante's inventory is not of great interest, the documents surrounding the sequestration of his property by the crown included copies of the 9th almirante's 1647 inventory, already cited.

For further information, see the document-specific comments appended to the other Almirante de Castilla inventories included in this volume (Docs. 43, 74, and 117), as well as the discussion in the Introduction.

The present document is the inventory of Doña Victoria Colonna, dowager Duquesa de Medina de Río seco, Condesa de Modica (in her own right), who died 28 December 1633. She was the mother of Don Juan Alfonso Enríquez de Cabrera, 9th Almirante de Castilla, and the widow of the 8th Almirante. The inventory was taken by Don Juan Alfonso at Madrid beginning 5 January 1634, with the paintings inventoried 9 January 1634 (ff. 90–100) and 7 March 1634 (ff. 146–149v). In addition to Don Juan Alfonso, her heirs included Don Francisco Fernández de la Cueva and Doña Ana Enríquez de Cabrera y Colonna, Duques de Albuquerque (for her death inventory, see Doc. 68), and Doña Feliche Enríquez Colonna, Duquesa de Lerma.

The collection as inventoried contained more than 250 paintings, all of which were left unattributed to any artist, and most of which depicted religious subjects, primarily individual saints. The exceptions were portraits, mostly of family members, a few landscapes and four paintings of The Seasons. Only one item stands out thematically, a work described as depicting Cleopatra feeding an old man with her breast. This was clearly a representation of Cimon and Pero (“Roman Charity”) which the person making the inventory has incorrectly identified. The erotic overtones of this painting are in stark contrast to the rows of male and female saints that must have surrounded it.

The inventory of the estate of the Genoese merchant Pablo Justiniano (d. 20 March 1634) was drawn up in Madrid by his brother Agustín Justiniano, beginning on 23 March 1634. While Flemish landscapes were extremely popular decoration in Madrid houses, it was less common to find listed small landscapes of an oval format, such as Justiniano's set of the months on panel (no. 3). Such works were painted by northern artists working in Rome, and one such picture appears hanging on the wall in the anonymous portrait of Sir Arthur Hopton (Meadows Museum, Dallas, Texas). Justiniano acquired his two paintings by Juan de la Corte (nos. 27 and 28), the only works to be attributed in the inventory, from the estate auction of the Marqués de Montesclaros in 1628 (Doc. 13), as he did his painting of Hercules fighting the Nemean lion (no. 29). One lot of paintings, comprising 13 religious subjects, three landscapes, and two portraits of clerics (nos. 23 and 24), were sold to Bartolomé Barrillero for the relatively small amount of some 400 reales. Barrillero was often documented buying works at estate auctions in the capital, such as that of the Duc d'Aarschot, for example. He may have dealt in paintings, keeping a small, distinguished collection which was inventoried for his marriage in 1651.<sup>1</sup>

Not included in the transcription is a list of works of art that Justiniano had willed to relatives and friends. A painting of the Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine and a sculpture of the Virgin, for instance, were sent to Genoa to Justiniano's daughter, a nun, Sor María Joana Justiniano, and another of Mary Magdalene was willed to his friend Antonio Balbi (Doc. 39). Two bronze sculptures of the Infant Jesus and the Infant John the Baptist, which were made in Seville, were sent to Justiniano's two other daughters in Genoa.

Antonio Moscoso Osorio and Francisca Luisa Fernández Portocarrero,
Marqués and Marquesa de Villanueva del Fresno y Barcarrota

Don Antonio Portocarrero y Moscoso, Marqués de Villanueva del Fresno, Gentilhombre de cámara of the king and Infante-Cardinal, died in Germany on 29 July 1634, having been nominated ambassador of Philip IV and accompanying the Cardinal-Infante Don Ferdinand on his journey from Milan to Flanders to become Governor of the Netherlands. The inventory of his estate was drawn up by his widow, Francisca Fernández Portocarrero, Marquesa de Villanueva del Fresno y Barcarrota, Señora de Moguer, and begun in Madrid on 9 September 1634. The estate was partitioned between his widow and son, Don Juan Gaspar Domingo Portocarrero, and the final agreement notarized on 3 September 1637, in which his widow inherited the paintings collection.<sup>1</sup>

Villanueva del Fresno's collection of paintings and the paintings of three cabinets was valued on 16 April 1635 by the painters Angelo Nardi and Francisco Bravo totaling some 26,500 reales. Paintings that belonged to the Marquesa de Villanueva's dowry included a Virgin and Child by one of the Carduchos (no. 103). Although no paintings by the obscure artist Francisco Gómez are known today, paintings by him of the king and queen of France were listed among a set of 11 full-length portraits of the House of Austria in Villanueva del Fresno's inventory. One of the paintings of a garden fountain attributed to Juan de la Corte in the valuation (nos. 36, 40) was said in the inventory to be painted by Francisco Gómez. As testimony to the marques' interest in art, Carducho in his Diálogos de la pintura of 1633, numbered him among the distinguished collectors of painting at court.<sup>2</sup> In the next year Jerónimo de Villanueva's secret expense account for the purchase of art for the Buen Retiro palace in 1634 listed a series of 14 paintings of the Plagues of Egypt, possibly by Pedro de Orrente, acquired from Villanueva del Fresno's collection.<sup>3</sup>

Villanueva del Fresno's collection comprised a wide range of subjects, including a painting of Lucretia (no. 5) which may have represented a nude or semi-nude female figure, and another picture of a woman bathing in a river (no. 106), probably the picture said in the inventory to depict "a nude woman tying up her hair". An unusual subject that seems to appear only in the inventory represented a "dream of a poet".<sup>4</sup> The majority of the pictures were listed anonymously in both inventory and valuation. However, the collection included copies after paintings by the time-honored Italian masters: Raphael's Transfiguration (no. 54) and three mythological subjects after Correggio (no. 52), Titian (no. 60). The only attributed modern Italian picture in Villanueva del Fresno's documents was a Flight into Egypt by the Venetian Caravaggesque artist Carlo Saraceni (no. 9). Taste for Saraceni's works may well have been stimulated by the importation of his four major paintings for the sacristy of Toledo Cathedral by Cardinal Sandoval ca. 1613–14.<sup>5</sup> Villanueva del Fresno's collection did include Toledan paintings: a head sketched in by Blas del Prado (no. 82) and paintings by El Greco of a Crucifixion (no. 56), a St. Peter (no. 55), and a Franciscan monk (no. 59), the last attributed in the inventory only.

Villanueva del Fresno's inventory in fact listed three other pictures with attributions to contemporary artists. In the inventory, El Greco's Franciscan monk was immediately preceded by a half-length painting of St. Peter by Jusepe de Ribera (no. 63), which was unattributed in the paintings appraisal. Villanueva del Fresno's other Ribera painting, a large St. Sebastian, was also unattributed in the appraisal (perhaps no. 15 or 35?). A further modern painting listed anonymously in the valuation was a painting of the Virgin attributed to Rubens in the inventory alone (f. 17, "otra pintura de nuestra señora de de [sic] Rubenes con moldura negra"). Perhaps these omissions on the part of the appraisers reflected their skepticism in front of the works, or perhaps these are merely inconsistencies of the kind that often occur in documents of this type.

Villanueva del Fresno's royal portraits were headed by those of the king and queen, and included two of the Infante Don Carlos and two of the Cardinal-Infante Don Ferdinand. An unusual aspect of the House of Austria series, however, were three portraits of Prince Philip (IV), one as a child in a carriage, another aged fourteen and another aged sixteen. In stark contrast to these portraits, the marqués also owned paintings of “heads of strange figures” (no. 107), perhaps comic images, and a painting of two “madmen” making an obscene gesture (no. 81). A portrait of a bearded woman (no. 117) reflects an interest in such “miracles of nature” among this class.

One of the portraits appears to have represented the Toledan painter Blas de Prado (no. 82), and two other paintings were portrait images of artists at work. One interesting painting listed in the inventory as “a half-length portrait of Alonso Sánchez portraying his majesty Philip II”<sup>6</sup> would appear to be a painting listed in the appraisal simply as a portrait of Alonso Sánchez Coello (no. 61). This could have been a self-portrait of the royal painter that celebrated his royal favor in a way analogous to Velázquez’s Las Meninas years later. This subject would also seem to relate to another painting mentioned only in Villanueva del Fresno’s valuation which depicted a sculptor making a head of Philip II (no. 50). This was surely the portrait attributed to El Greco (now in an English private collection) that represents a sculptor, perhaps Pompeo Leoni, making a marble bust of Philip II, an image that is the direct precedent for Velázquez’s portrait of Juan Martínez Montañés making a bust of Philip IV (Madrid, Museo del Prado).<sup>7</sup>

Don Francisco de Eraso, Conde de Humanes, and a member of the Consejo Real de las Indias, died on 24 September 1635. The inventory of his estate was drawn up by his widow María de Fonseca y Ulloa, Condesa de Umanes, beginning in Madrid on 28 September. The conde was a close friend and confidant of Philip IV's privado, the Conde-Duque de Olivares, and, like him, was a bibliophile, owning an enormous library of books. His collection of some 58 paintings, however, was comparatively small for a member of the Spanish nobility. These were valued on 18 November 1635 by Francisco Gómez, who styled himself "painter to the King".

Despite the small size of Humanes' collection, some of his paintings were clearly very choice pieces. While he owned a set of the twelve Months of the Year copied from prototypes by the Bassani (no. 1), his five original religious subjects by Jacopo da Ponte and another member of the family (nos. 11–15) must have been the envy of many collectors at court. Given the almost universal admiration of the skill of the Bassani in painting animals, it is not surprising that the most highly valued painting in the collection was Noah's Ark by Bassano (no. 12). Humanes also owned examples of religious painting by two important artists patronized by Philip II. The Genoese painter Luca Cambiaso worked at the Escorial, and the high value of Humanes' Ecce Homo by this artist (no. 16) suggests that this was a highly esteemed painting of great quality, worth many times more than the copy after Titian's Ecce Homo from the Spanish royal collection (no. 18). Philip II's royal portraitist Alonso Sánchez Coello was represented by a Coronation of the Virgin (no. 10). While the document did not identify Sánchez Coello as the author of any of Humanes' portraits, two valuable ancestral portraits painted by Antonio Mor (nos. 4, 5) probably formed an inalienable part of the family collection. This collector's apparent lack of interest in contemporary Spanish artists and some of the newer secular subject matters, such as genre and still-life paintings, raises the distinct possibility that many of the pictures in Humanes' inventory had passed to him through inheritance.

Cristóbal González Cossío was a royal secretary and accountant (contador de resultas) in the Contaduría general de Cuentas y Resultas, one of the two bodies concerned with administering Crown finances. His estate was inventoried by his widow, Catalina de Velasco de Villarán (her death inventory is Doc. 81), in Madrid from 16 May 1636. His collection of pictures, appraised by the painter Andrés López on 21 June, included portraits of Philip III and Queen Margarita as well as small paintings “de los Reyes,” probably Philip IV and his queen, a fact that suggests the collection was formed over both reigns. It is a revealing example of the taste for painting of a non-noble member of the royal administration in the first half of the seventeenth century.

Unlike his noble counterparts, González Cossío was unlikely to have been able to bid for originals by the most famous Italian artists of the past of the level of those whose works adorned the royal collections. He therefore owned copies after Raphael’s Madonna della sedia (no. 1), Titian (no. 2), Veronese (no. 3), and Bassano (no. 39); the relatively high values Andrés López assigned to these suggests that they were paintings of considerable artistic merit. Indeed, the copy after Raphael was the most valuable painting in the collection and was worth only slightly less than two original pictures by the contemporary Roman painter Antiveduto Grammatica (nos. 51, 52), who in his maturity painted in a Caravaggesque manner. Paintings by this artist attributed in a Spanish inventory bear out the remark in Mancini’s Considerazioni sulla pittura that Grammatica sent many works to Spain. It is also worth noting that two paintings in the collection had Genoese frames (nos. 5, 59).

González Cossío’s Spanish pictures included paintings by Pedro de Orrente, whose two landscapes (nos. 57, 70) were valued at considerably less than his figurative painting of St. Lawrence (no. 4). Not surprisingly, the other painters represented in the collection were contemporary artists active at court. Juan de la Corte’s battle paintings (no. 18) were extremely popular among court collectors. The Italian court painters Vicencio Carducho and Eugenio Caxés, who also appear to have enjoyed a thriving practice for private clients, were also represented, Carducho by an Ecce Homo (no. 13) and Caxés by three paintings, a Nativity scene on a stone tondo (no. 65) and two landscapes with religious subjects (nos. 66, 67).

The collection included a number of family portraits. Less than half of González Cossío’s pictures were of religious subjects, but he owned only one mythological subject, a copy of the Birth of Venus after Veronese (no. 3) which appears to have been his only painting of a female nude. However, his collection included a wide range of themes. Some of the genre subjects probably provided visual pleasure for their own sake, such as flowerpieces (no. 28), landscapes, animals fighting (nos. 29, 30), and a long picture of carnival festivities (no. 78). While there were landscape paintings, González Cossío also appears to have had a particular liking for topographical subjects, which perhaps reflected his own travels in Spain, and the document listed views of Seville (no. 33), the Escorial (no. 17), Toledo (nos. 22, 25, 26), the “Casa de Villegas” (no. 77), and other cities (no. 34). He seems too to have had a taste for the curious, represented by four paintings of heads signifying the Seasons (no. 37), perhaps in the style of Arcimboldo, as well as a number of paintings of “drunkards and buffoons” (nos. 80, 83). Nine of these paintings were listed as hanging in a corridor of González Cossío’s house, perhaps in imitation of the prime minister, the Conde-Duque de Olivares, who decorated the corridor leading to his study in the Alcázar with portraits of madmen and fools, where they were a constant reminder of the folly of vanity and pride among the great of this world.<sup>1</sup>

Hernando de Espejo (d. 5 August 1637) was a prominent courtier during the reigns of both Philip III and Philip IV who, when he died in 1637, held the title of Caballerizo de la Reina. He was knight of the Order of Santiago and comendador of Torres y Cañamares, which signified that he was entitled to receive rents from this benefice owned by the order. Espejo also occupied the important palace office of guardajoyas under Philip III, with responsibilities for the royal collection of silverware, liturgical objects and jewelry (including royal toisons de oro) which required Espejo always to be at hand and in continual service in the palace. The painter Luis Tristán pointed out in his annotations to Vasari's Life of Titian that Philip III had removed from the public view Titian's mythological paintings and a Tarquin and Lucretia, which had been given over to Espejo for safekeeping.<sup>1</sup> It was in this role that Espejo probably came into contact with two painters in the royal service, Pedro Guzmán "El Cojo," pintor del rey from 1601–1616, and Bartolomé González (1564–1627) whose works he owned.

Although Espejo's widow, Catalina Maldonado Mesía y Tovar, began his postmortem inventory in Madrid on 14 September 1637, this was interrupted until 2 May 1639. Espejo's paintings collection in his property at Madrid was appraised by the painter Juan Antonio Ceronio.

Espejo's collection would appear to reflect the particularly devout taste for paintings that was in ascendance at court during the reign of Philip III. One of the most valuable paintings was a Flemish Nativity (no. 1). His Annunciation from Florence (no. 4) was most probably a copy of the miraculous thirteenth-century fresco from S. Annunziata which was popular among collectors in the early part of the century, with copies in the royal collection and the collections of the Duque de Lerma and Condesa de Lemos.<sup>2</sup> The only attributed works in the valuation were to two of the most prominent court painters of the reign of Philip III and were devotional paintings. One was a Crucified Christ painted on a walnut cross by Pedro de Guzmán (El Cojo) (no. 23), and a Virgin and Suckling Christ Child by Bartolomé González (no. 18). This latter painting may be the painting of the Virgen de la leche by Bartolomé González today in the royal convent of La Encarnación in Madrid, founded by Queen Margarita, or a version of it.<sup>3</sup> Another document, discussed in the Introduction, shows that Espejo directly patronized González, from whom he commissioned six paintings of saints and three portraits.

Espejo's collection was made up mostly of religious paintings, and he owned no mythological narrative subjects. Two of the religious pictures were in the form of reliquaries (nos. 10, 11). Some of these images on copper were set into elaborate, precious frames made of ebony, silver, and bronze, which made the works very valuable (no. 12, 13) and necessitated the expert intervention of a cabinetmaker and silversmith in their appraisal (nos. 16, 17). The painter Ceronio also appears to have valued the two sculptures included with the pictures (nos. 20, 21). Although Espejo owned no paintings of mythological subjects, there were two curious works in his collection that appear to have been arcane allegories with Cupid in a landscape format (no. 31). There was an example of the popular classical subject of the Burning of Troy, which was paired with a seascape with ships (no. 37). Among Espejo's landscape pictures (no. 32), there were two Flemish pictures whose value suggests works of considerable quality (no. 30), and two sets of Four Seasons (no. 25). One of the most interesting groups of secular paintings made up two decorative friezes in rooms of Espejo's Madrid house (nos. 35, 36): one was a frieze of 17 pictures representing landscapes and birds and another of 12 pictures of fruit and birds. The fact that these both measured 35 varas long and were valued by length perhaps suggests that the images were painted as quadri riportati onto a continuous canvas strip rather than being separate and independent canvases. Such nature themes were appropriate to the rural setting of this house.

Further paintings not included here hung at Espejo's house in the country at Olias (Toledo) and were valued by a resident there, one Pedro de Alegría, on 11 July 1640. While the majority of these were not Espejo's best works, and were described as "ziertas Pinturas Hordinarias questava en la cassa," the collection did include a number of valuable portraits. These were listed as four full-length portraits worth 250 reales each, representing Hernando de Espejo himself, his first wife Ana María de Bustos, and his second wife Catalina Maldonado, which were probably the paintings listed in Bartolomé González's receipt of 14 February 1620 (see Introduction), and a portrait of Espejo's father-in-law, Don Juan Maldonado. Espejo's family pride was further expressed in four coats of arms of the Espejos. His loyalty in royal service was clear from a set of 15 portraits of the Spanish Habsburgs and one of the Duque de Lerma.

The Flemish aristocrat resident at the Spanish court, Jean de Croy, 2nd Comte de Solre and Baron de Molembais (d. 1638), inherited court favor, political status, and Spanish connections from his father Philippe de Croy, 1st Comte de Solre (d. 1612), a prominent minister and diplomatic envoy of the Spanish Regents of the Netherlands.<sup>1</sup> Solre first went to Madrid in 1613 and received the Order of the Golden Fleece from Philip III in 1614. In Madrid in 1624, with recommendations from the Archduchess Isabella, Solre was sworn into the Consejo de Estado and was made a gentleman of the King's Chamber (Gentilhombre de la cámara de Su Majestad). Philip IV had a high opinion of his diplomatic abilities, and he was sent on missions to France, Poland, Germany, and the Netherlands. In 1628 Solre was appointed to the newly reformed and augmented Council of Flanders (Consejo de Flandes), becoming an important intermediary between Madrid and Brussels. Solre had been captain of the guard of the Archduke Albert, and in Madrid was made captain of the Flemish royal guard of Archers on 5 May 1624, remaining in this post until his death in 1638.

On his death in Madrid in 1638, an inventory of Solre's possessions at court was drawn up by his mayordomo Lorenzo del Campo and his Flemish executors, the most senior of whom was Charles de Bonnières, Baron de Auchy. (See Solre's codicil of 13 July 1635, opened on his death on 9 May 1638.)<sup>2</sup> The contents of nine rooms of Solre's house on the calle de Alcalá and his huerta were inventoried, although the function of these rooms was not specified. There was a large and small gallery, two "piezas de retrete" and the "Camarín," in which Solre had hung many of his pictures on copper and best paintings (i.e., nos. 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 22, 69). Appropriately, Solre had decorated a building in his orchard garden ("huerta") with nature paintings, including landscapes, still lifes, and animal pictures (nos. 76–80). Solre's collection of some 151 valuable paintings that hung throughout the house were the first items of furniture to be inventoried in each of the rooms visited. Remarkably, only six of the paintings were religious subjects; the vast majority were of profane or decorative subjects, which including as many as 82 landscapes. The collection was appraised on 19 May 1638 by Felix Castello (ca.1595–1651), an artist of Italian extraction, and Felipe Diriksen (1590–1679), a member of Solre's Guard of Archers, whom the document described as "pintores de mucha opinion en esta corte". Solre's collection of sculptures and bronzes was appraised on 14 July 1638.

Solre's executors decided to sell his goods in Madrid as soon as possible, thereby avoiding the costs and risks of storing them until his Flemish heirs came to court, and also avoiding the costs of transporting the estate to Flanders.<sup>3</sup> The auction of Solre's effects began on 1 July 1638, and attracted many non-noble collectors. Given the numbers of Flemish pictures that were probably on sale, the Marqués de Leganés was conspicuous by his absence. At the time, he was Governor of Milan and was perhaps away from the court. On 3 July, Don Luis de Haro bought two bronze figures of Hercules from the collection. Marginal annotations in the appraisal document correspond to numbered lots in the sale document. In our transcription, however, only those annotations denoting pictures reserved for Solre's estate ("en ser") and those works acquired by Philip IV ("su mag.<sup>d</sup> le tiene") have been retained.

The choice of an Italian and a Flemish artist to value the paintings might imply a mistrust of Spanish painters' knowledge and appreciation of foreign art. Apart from two religious subjects after Rubens (nos. 23, 24), none of the pictures was attributed. However, their subject matter and supports – some on panel, copper and stone – suggests that many came from Solre's native Flanders. One of Solre's paintings of Moses and the Brazen Serpent (no. 1) was owned by Don Francisco de Moncada, Marqués de Aytona, the Spanish ambassador in Flanders, and was worth the large sum of 3,000 reales. Evidently a painting by an important artist, this measured some 168 x 231 cm. and might be identifiable with the early painting by Van Dyck of this subject and with similar dimensions (205 x 235 cm.) now in the Prado, which was first inventoried in the Madrid Alcázar in 1666.<sup>4</sup>

Solre can be identified as one of the most important and distinguished patrons of Juan van der Hamen. Van der Hamen's Flemish name and background may have been a factor in attracting his attention, as was the fact that the artist was one of Solre's own men in the royal guard of Flemish Archers. At some time after his arrival in Madrid in 1624 Solre commissioned from Van der Hamen the recently rediscovered pair of unsigned trompe l'oeil still lifes with vases of flowers and dogs, now in the Prado (Figs. 30 and 31).<sup>5</sup> Two paintings that must be identifiable with these were inventoried hanging unframed on the door in the third room of Solre's house, whose function was unspecified but which led on to his "Galeria Mayor" or picture gallery: "otros dos payses [sic] a lo largo de una puerta Con dos Ramillerteros arriva y dos perros abajo sin marcos". In the collection valuation they were more explicitly described as "dos quadros donde estan Unos Ramilleteros de flores de flandes y unos vidros y dulçes con unos Perros" (no. 49). The paintings were unframed and their dimensions given as 252 x 112 cm., which roughly corresponds with the present size of Van der Hamen's (228 x 95 cm.). Valued at thirty ducats each (330 reales), they were acquired from Solre's collection by the king. In the royal inventory of 1666 they were hanging in the room where the king dined in the Madrid Alcázar, described as Flemish pictures, and again valued at 30 ducats each.<sup>6</sup>

In the Prado pair, Van der Hamen displayed the full range of his talent in still life for one of his most appreciative patrons. Some of the elements in these unusual illusionistic still lifes were a familiar part of the repertory of still-life pictures on the theme of hospitality which Van der Hamen aimed at distinguished clients (subjects included ormolu vases, sweetmeats, and flowers). Solre may have particularly requested such a demonstration of Van der Hamen's skill in flower painting, an idiom associated with Flemish expertise and appropriate for a patron who may also have owned his Offering to Flora, discussed below. Van der Hamen's magnificent arrangements of flowers dwarf his other bouquets, and are much richer in blooms, including prominent tulips in one picture, perhaps the ones described as "flores de flandes" in the appraisal document. The unusual clock represented in one picture may have been designed to appeal to a patron who, judging from the valuation of his timepieces, may have had a taste for such things.<sup>7</sup> The pictures may also have complemented Solre's lifestyle in a literal sense if some of the objects represented were actually taken from life, including Solre's pet dogs. There was a mirror in the room where the paintings hung and attachments on the walls for bouquets of real flowers. Perhaps the wood and tile floor and serving tables covered with green damask reflected the actual decor of Solre's house.

The inventory entry suggests that the paintings may have hung flanking a doorway on either side. Or, in their unframed state, they may have disguised a doorway, hanging the length of a door, perhaps set into the panels of a double door. Their illusionism would be most effective when hung together with the orthogonals of the tiled floor leading to a central vanishing point. However, the fact that Van der Hamen has represented the ends of the tables might imply an arrangement with the larger dog on the right of the smaller. The clock shows almost five o'clock, perhaps time for a merienda of sweets and chilled wine. The illusionistic qualities of these large paintings with life-sized elements invite the viewer to sample the sweetmeats, catch the scent of the bouquets, and stroke the dogs.

The function of the room in which Van der Hamen's illusionistic still lifes hung is unknown. This was decorated with landscapes and bird paintings, and was dominated by a pair of a large, unframed kitchen still lifes of fish and game birds, including a swan (nos. 44, 45), along with associated paintings of fowl hunts, a picture of different birds and landscapes. These still lifes were appraised at 13,000 reales, worth many times the value of Van der Hamen's two still lifes and the most valuable pictures in Solre's collection, perhaps by a Flemish artist such as Frans Snyder. Not surprisingly, these first-rate paintings were both acquired by the king for the royal collection. This case of highly valued still lifes is paralleled by the still lifes in the collection of the Marqués de Montesclaros (Doc. 13).

As noted above, marginal annotations to the appraisal document of Solre's collection specify paintings taken by Philip IV, perhaps to decorate the Buen Retiro palace. Evidently, the king took his pick of the pictures before the estate sale beginning on 1 July 1638, although it is not clear whether the works were bought or given. This was precisely at the time when the English ambassador, Sir Arthur Hopton, remarked on the quantity and quality of Philip IV's purchases of paintings. Philip acquired 28 of Solre's paintings: a religious subject (no. 6), 16 good-quality landscapes on panel, copper, and canvas (nos. 10, 11, 12), a valuable pair of scenes of boar and deer hunts (nos. 46), and eight of the genre and still-life pictures (nos. 7, 9, 44, 45, 49, 51, 52), including a large and valuable painting of a festoon of fruit, flowers, and putti, which may have been a Flemish work (no. 4). Some of these paintings may have been destined to decorate the Buen Retiro palace. However, the latter paintings of hunts, genre scenes, and festoons exemplified Philip IV's taste for Flemish painting in the decoration of the summer apartments of the Madrid Alcázar, for which Van der Hamen had been commissioned to produce pendants to Flemish garland paintings with putti.<sup>8</sup>

Indeed, the paintings inventoried in one large gallery of Solre's palace, the "galeria Mayor," parallel the choice of subjects in Philip's recently decorated summer dining room of the Madrid Alcázar. The latter was hung with 30 Flemish pictures of broadly complementary subjects appropriate to the room's function, including hunting and animal pictures, the senses, genre paintings, and two paintings by Van der Hamen, representing a bowl of fruit and flowers held by a nude boy and a festoon. Nature's bounty was personified in Rubens and Snyders' collaborative painting of Ceres and Pan (Madrid, Prado).<sup>9</sup> Solre also appears to have decorated his large gallery with an eye to an analogous ensemble, since this was hung with some 36 paintings loosely associated with nature themes. Paintings of goddesses of nature and the seasons were placed in this gallery, which also included landscapes, hunting scenes, fruit still lifes, and genre paintings. A showpiece of the gallery was a large copper of a Banquet of the Gods with small figures, which was probably Flemish. It may have been simply a matter of convenience to hang over the doors two genre paintings of toothpulling and soldiers playing cards (nos. 51, 52). These paintings were acquired by Philip IV, along with another painting of a nocturnal scene of music making and card playing (no. 7). It is not beyond the realm of possibility that the two former pictures could be identified with paintings of these subjects in the royal collection by Theodor Rombouts (1597–1637).<sup>10</sup>

Two of the three large paintings with goddesses, fruit, and flowers that hung in the gallery were probably Van der Hamen's Pomona and Vertumnus (229 x 149 cm.) of 1626 (Fig. 29) and his Offering to Flora (216 x 140 cm.) of 1627 (Fig. 28), which are based on Flemish prototypes the artist knew from the royal collection.<sup>11</sup> The inventory descriptions are unfortunately somewhat cursory; the pictures were called "tres pinturas con sus marcos de pino de negro, una de fructas con una figura de dama. otra de Rayces y otra de flores cada una de dhas tres pinturas de dos varas de alto y vara y media de ancho" (measuring some 168 x 126 cm.). The three were separated into a pair (worth the relatively high sum of 2,400 reales) and a single painting (at 1,700 reales) in the valuation of Solre's collection: "dos quadros de dos diosas una de flores y otro de fructas que tienen de cayda tres varas poco mas o menos y de ancho dos Varas menos sesma poco mas o menos" (no. 47) and "otro quadro del tamaño de Los dhas tambien de una diossa con un canastilla de fructas en la mano" (no. 48). Their dimensions were slightly larger in the latter entry, some 252 x 150 cm., closer in size to Van der Hamen's pictures, although the Offering to Flora has been slightly reduced in size. However, it is also possible that Solre's paintings are identifiable with three pastiches comprising elements from Van der Hamen and Rubens painted in Madrid in the 1630s, allegories of Spring, Summer, and Autumn that were listed in the collection of the Marqués de Leganés in 1655, although their appraised value would seem to argue against this.<sup>12</sup> The third picture of a goddess with flowers (no. 48) was acquired by one Jacinto Lanini for 1,500 reales (3 July 1638). The pair of allegories ascribed to Van der Hamen here were bought at Solre's estate auction for 1,800 reales by Bartolomé Barrilaro (29 December 1638), who also bought four fruit still lifes, a portrait of the Queen of England, and four religious subjects. The allegories were not listed in his collection in 1651, although the portrait of the Queen of England which he bought from Solre's auction on 29 December 1638 was listed.<sup>13</sup>

Diego Pérez Dávila, Abad de Santa Marta de Astorga

1638

The postmortem inventory of the goods in Madrid of Maestro Diego Pérez Dávila (d. 17 July 1638), Abbot of Santa Marta de Astorga, was begun on 8 August 1638. The few inventoried paintings were appraised on 16 August 1638 by the royal painter Angelo Nardi (ff. 591v–592v). Apart from 15 religious subjects, Pérez Dávila owned a picture of Laocoön (no. 11), which reveals a rather more learned aspect of his taste. He may even have been attracted to the subject because it represented a pagan priest who was killed while officiating at the altar of Neptune. While this may have been a representation of the classical sculptural group in the Vatican collections, the most famous Spanish painting of this theme was that of El Greco, which was known in a number of versions.<sup>1</sup>

An inventory of the estate of Sebastián Díaz de Ontiveros and his wife Ana María Núñez de Cos began on 7 June 1639, the date of her death. The extensive picture collection was appraised on 14 August by the painter Diego Rodríguez. Although the document does not specify the profession of Díaz de Ontiveros, the presence of portraits of Spanish royals in the collection suggests that he was in royal service, as was his son, Don Bernabé Díaz de Cos, a contador (royal accountant). There were full-length and half-length portraits of Philip IV and Queen Isabella (nos. 35, 36), as well as one of prince Baltasar Carlos (no. 37), and two pairs of portraits of Díaz de Ontiveros and his wife (nos. 31, 32). Interestingly, two of the latter portraits (no. 32) and another of a relative (no. 33) were said to be painted “from nature”. Díaz de Ontiveros himself died on 24 June 1641, and his inventory was drawn up by his son and heir, with the paintings collection appraised by the painter Matias Pastor on 1–2 September 1641.<sup>1</sup> Only a few paintings were sold at the public sale of September 1641; the majority of paintings were sold in an estate sale of May 1646.<sup>2</sup>

The appraisal of Díaz de Ontiveros’ paintings in 1639 began with religious subjects, which were perhaps considered to be the most important images in the collection and many of which were from his oratory (as specified in his inventory of June–July 1641). A copy after a Correggio Virgin and Child (no. 21) had been painted by Antonio Ricci, a mediocre artist who nevertheless had a livelihood copying paintings by sixteenth-century masters. However, the collection included a broad range of subject matter, which indicates a taste for the diverse sorts of pleasure afforded by the art of painting. At the other end of the scale to his religious pictures, Díaz de Ontiveros also owned a small comic painting of a drunkard (no. 66). There were 15 still-life paintings, four of which were by Juan van der Hamen (no. 38), the best still-life painter of the 1620s. Although the document specified that these were “originals” in order to distinguish them from the studio variants and copies common on the Madrid market, they were, nevertheless, listed as overwindows in the inventory of 1641. Among the landscape paintings were works by Paul Bril (no. 41), and two contemporary Spanish artists who specialized in landscapes for private collectors at court: Francisco Colantes (no. 56) and Juan de la Corte (no. 67).

Two of the landscapes depicted mythological subjects (nos. 68), and the collection included figure paintings of the Abduction of Proserpina (no. 46), Venus and Cupid, Cupid, Cupid chastised by Pallas Athena, and Midas (the last four pictures all described in item no. 48), the last painting perhaps by Eugenio Caxés, whose name was garbled to “Jaques” in the document. In the inventory of 1641, these mythologies, along with a mix of religious images, seascapes, landscapes, sibyls, and still lifes, were listed in Díaz de Ontiveros’ study (“dentro del escritorio”). His Abduction of Ganymede (no. 51) was a copy after the painting by Correggio that had been in the famous collection of Antonio Pérez, which was copied for the Spanish royal collection by Eugenio Caxés in 1604, and is now in Vienna.<sup>3</sup> In the appraisal of Díaz de Ontiveros’ collection in 1641 the painting of Cupid making his bow (no. 54) was also listed as a copy after another Correggio mythology, although this is reminiscent of a painting by Parmigianino also now in Vienna. These two copies made up part of the decoration inventoried in 1641 of his urban recreational “casa jardín” on the outskirts of the capital, along with other “fables,” the Burning of Troy (no. 45; complemented in the collection by a less common image of the story of Aeneas and Troy, no. 52), paintings of the Months, landscapes (including two views of the environs of Madrid) and still lifes. Díaz de Ontiveros’ painting of “the pícaro of Rome removing a thorn” (no. 53) was a representation of the famous classical bronze of the Boy Removing a Thorn from his Foot, the “Spinario,” which was long considered to represent a shepherd boy.<sup>4</sup> This painting was also inventoried in 1641 hanging in his “casa jardín” (“un quadro ... de una estatua de roma de Un hombre que se saca Una astilla del pie”). It was bought from his estate by Don Agustín Daza (4 May 1646), along with a large number of other pictures, and was inventoried in the latter’s collection on his death in 1678.<sup>5</sup> This was one of the most famous antiques visible in Rome and copies in sculpture existed in Spain, one example presiding over a fountain at Aranjuez since the sixteenth century. More than anything, it was probably the naturalism of this classical genre subject which was so admired; other painted examples listed in inventories of picture collections of the period testify to its popularity among connoisseurs. A copy was listed in the collection of the royal escribano Juan González Trujeque in 1643<sup>6</sup> and in the collection of Don Fernando de Borja in 1666 (Doc. 78, no. 138).

Inventories of the estate of the royal accountant (contador) Jerónimo de Alviz (d. 23 August 1639) were taken in 1628 and on his death in 1639. On 26 February 1628, Alviz drew up an appraisal of his capital assets brought to his marriage to Manuela Cortés, widow of the regidor of Valladolid Andrés Alonso de Usategui.<sup>1</sup> In this document, three of the paintings in Alviz's collection were attributed to the court painter Eugenio Caxés (f. 56, "Yten tres quadros de pintura de payses de una tercia de largo y una quarta de ancho de las ystorias de abraan de la lucha de jacob con el angel y otro de media bara de alto y una tercia de ancho pintado a lo alto del carro de elias de mano de eugenio Cajesi," valued at 8 ducats each). Caxés himself valued the collection on 23 August 1628 on the premature death of Manuela Cortés, a document in which none of the works were attributed.<sup>2</sup> The entire picture collection was considered Alviz's property. On Alviz's own death in August 1639, his widow, Catalina de la Cámara, drew up the postmortem inventory of the estate and had the picture collection appraised by the painter Francisco Mexía on 12 September 1639.<sup>3</sup> Many of the pictures that were attributed in the inventory were not copied into Mexía's appraisal, and these appear in brackets in the transcription below. In the estate sale of Alviz's goods, paintings were bought by a number of collectors of note.<sup>4</sup> Don Pedro de Velasco, for instance, bought works by Caxés, Don Juan del Hierro bought the Caxés Immaculate Conception, and Don Francisco Gutiérrez bought many works, including pictures by Orrente, Caxés, and Juan de la Corte.

In the 1639 documents, attributions of paintings were all to Spanish painters practicing in the capital, with whom Alviz could have had personal contact. Although Alviz's picture collection was not large, numbering only 52 paintings, his importance as a collector of paintings by contemporary artists merited him a mention among the outstanding connoisseurs at court in Carducho's Diálogos de la pintura.<sup>5</sup> By 1639, Alviz boasted an Immaculate Conception (no. 1) and nine religious narrative paintings by Eugenio Caxés (nos. 8, 18, 19, 20, 21, 26), one of which was not listed in the appraisal, as well as works by Caxés' colleague at court, Vicencio Carducho (nos. 2, 3, 4).

Alviz owned paintings of Old Testament subjects by Pedro de Orrente (nos. 5 and 17) – the latter seemingly commissioned by Alviz according to the accompanying annotation. The popular painter of scenes with small figures, Juan de la Corte was represented in the collection by four paintings (nos. 9, 16, 23, 28). There was a figure subject of Moses by Francisco de Collantes (no. 24), which may have been paired with a story of Jonah by Juan de la Corte (no. 23). Three subject paintings were listed by Cristóbal de Acevedo (no. 6), an artist who was a popular painter of landscapes.<sup>6</sup> A landscape by Juan de la Corte (no. 28) depicted the Conversion of St. Paul, and two landscapes with figure subjects by Collantes appear to have hung near a picture by Andrés de Vargas (no. 27). Alviz acquired most of his still-life paintings after 1628, since in the inventories of this year only two such paintings were listed anonymously. One was a painting of "some fruit" and the other a breakfast piece, "Un almuerzo de tocino y algunas frutas," worth 100 reales, and both pictures could be subsumed under the descriptions in the later inventory. In 1639, Alviz's collection listed eight still-life paintings, seven by Juan van der Hamen. These works could have been acquired directly from the artist in the last three years of his life or bought on the open market. Three pictures were worth 100 reales each, two representing a cardoon and hanging grapes (no. 12) and another larger picture glasses, clay vessels, and fruit (no. 13). Four other smaller pictures depicted still lifes of fruit (nos. 11, 15). It was natural that Alviz should have collected still lifes by Van der Hamen, since he was not only the best and most famous still-life painter in Madrid in the 1620s, but also an important member of the Carducho circle at court. One other still-life painting with radishes and fruit was said to be by "the Dominican” (no. 14), which possibly refers to Juan Bautista Mayno, an ordained member of the Dominican order. An Italian artist of this name was documented in Madrid in 1608,<sup>7</sup> but perhaps the artist most likely to have been referred to here was a Flemish still-life painter called Allaert who was also a Dominican father, and by whom ten bird still lifes were listed in the collection of the Conde de Molina in 1675 (Doc. 93, nos. 8, 9, 14, 15, 93, 102).

Francisca Luisa Fernández Portocarrero, Marquesa de Villanueva del Fresno y Barcarrota

1640

The postmortem inventory of Villanueva del Fresno's widow, Francisca Luisa Portocarrero, Marquesa de Villanueva del Fresno (d.22 December 1639), begun on the day of her death, was drawn up by her executors, the Conde de Altamira and Conde de Castrillo. Her paintings were appraised by the painter Don Juan Tellez on 5 January and 1 February 1640. These pictures were basically those that the Marquesa inherited in the partition of her husband's estate on 3 September 1637,<sup>1</sup> (see also Doc. 20, which is the valuation of his estate) which also included some 14 works from her dowry. Unfortunately, the pictures listed in the document were largely anonymous, except for an attribution to "el Vassal," of one of the Four Seasons (no. 66) and three Flemish works (nos. 5, 32, 73). Many of the paintings, however, were listed in her husband's valuation some five years earlier, where they appear to have been assigned higher valuations. For instance, a Juan de la Corte garden scene was appraised at 330 reales in the collection in 1635 (Doc. 20, no. 36) and at slightly less in 1640 (no. 50). In the case of the Villanueva copy of Raphael's Transfiguration, worth 300 reales in 1635 (Doc. 20, no. 54), in 1640 this was valued at only 66 reales (no. 63) because the paint was described as lifting off the panel. This particular painting is unlikely to have survived.

In many cases in the following transcription, the numerical value given at the end of the item does not correspond to the written value given within the body of the entry. Also, there are instances where no numerical value is given at all. It is possible that the numerical values are related to the prices realized at the sale of the estate that immediately followed the valuation, beginning on 6 March 1640.

On the death of the lawyer Don Diego de Angulo (d. before 10 April 1640), fiscal of the Chancilleria de Granada, two painters, Andrés López Polanco and Alonso Cano, made an appraisal of his small picture collection, dated in Madrid 22 October 1640 (ff. 142–144). Despite their joint expertise, and the high values assigned to some of the pictures, the only attributed works were by the Bassano family. One was a copy of Emmaus (no. 6), and there were five pictures signed by Francesco (II) Bassano, one of the Expulsion from the Temple (no. 7), and a set of Four Seasons (5). These latter works, along with a set of 12 poor-quality flower pictures (no. 14), were the only profane subjects in Angulo's collection. Marginal notes to the inventory show that the Protonotario Jerónimo de Villanueva bought nos. 8 and 16 for their appraised value, and that the silver relief of the Nativity (no. 4) was given as a gift to Philip IV.

Philippe Charles d'Arenberg, Duc d'Aarschot and Prince-Comte d'Arenberg

1641

This document is a record of the picture collection of the Flemish prince Philippe Charles d'Arenberg, Duc d'Aarschot y Prince-Comte d'Arenberg (1587–1640).<sup>1</sup> Although Aarschot was received with great honours at the Spanish court when he arrived in Madrid in 1633, he was suspected of involvement in the rebellion of the Flemish nobles in 1632 and of negotiating with the Dutch to secure the independence of Flanders from Spain. He was arrested after a royal audience on Easter Sunday, 15 April 1634, and imprisoned outside Madrid on charges of high treason against the king. From December 1634, Aarschot lived under house arrest in the capital, and at the beginning of 1637 was joined by his wife, Marie-Cléopée de Hohenzollern, and their son, Philippe-François, who lived at a separate address. The case against Aarschot was never proved, but he died before Philip IV could rehabilitate him, aged fifty-two, on 25 September 1640. His wife left Madrid on 6 June 1641, while his son remained at the Spanish court to pursue a military career (he was made a Knight of the Golden Fleece in 1646).

The postmortem inventory of Aarschot's goods in the Madrid palace, Casa de las Siete Chimeneas, was begun on 26 September 1640, drawn up by his widow and executors, Fray Pedro de la Concepción, Julian de la Visitación, and the licenciado Don Diego de Altamirano (Doc. 35). The paintings of the duc's gallery were inventoried between 26–28 September 1640. The inventory of the duc's paintings in the houses on the calle de Alcalá inhabited by the duc's widow and their son, which were owned by Don Rodrigo de Herrera (see Doc. 33), was resumed on 2 October 1640.

Aarschot's collection, numbering some 400 paintings, was valued on 9 August 1641, by two painters, Antonio de Puga (1602–48) and Juan de la Corte. Puga's own estate inventory testifies to his thriving painting practice, although only one signed work by him is known today, a St. Jerome which is itself a copy of a painting by Francisco Collantes.<sup>2</sup> Puga appears to have worked extensively for Aarschot. A notarized set of the duc's accounts during his residence in Spain shows that Puga received a payment of 1,900 reales for unspecified work between September and November 1638.<sup>3</sup> As well as valuing the duc's collection, Puga oversaw the 2 October 1640, inventory of his paintings. Three unfinished portraits listed in the inventory were said to be in Puga's apoyento, perhaps referring to his quarters in the palace. One was a large unfinished family group portrait, over six varas long, of the duc, the duchesse, and their son (“mas Un quadro comencado de seis varas de largo del Retrato del duque y La duquesa su muger y El principe su hijo que no esta Acavado de hacer”), and the two others were unfinished full-lengths of the duc and his son. If not the same picture, the duc's portrait must be related to the unfinished portrait of Aarschot that was inventoried in Puga's studio on his death in 1648.<sup>4</sup> A landscape “by the painter who portrayed the duke alive” (“del pintor que retratta al duque vivo”) may also have been by Puga. Aarschot's inventory also listed a further unframed full-length of the duc and a painting of the head of the deceased duc. Puga was paid 450 reales in two installments in April 1638 and 16 February 1639, for a portrait of the duc and duchesse, inventoried in her quarters. Another painter, Jean Ducamps (Cambrai ca.1600–1650 Madrid), known in Spain as Juan del Campo, was paid 1,100 reales in September 1639 for a portrait of “the prince,” probably Philippe-François (“para el retrato del Príncipe mi señor en manos de Juan de Champ pintor”).<sup>5</sup>

Puga's copy of one of Aarschot's most important pictures, Rubens' Wolf Hunt (Fig. 32), was inventoried as unfinished in Aarschot's collection on 27 September 1640. The artist was paid 600 reales on account for this painting in the autumn of 1640 (“a cuenta de la copia que hace de una pintura de rubens que es una Casa de lobos,”<sup>6</sup>) and on 11 April 1641, Puga wrote in his own hand and signed a receipt for the total of 1,500 reales “por la copia de la pintura grande de Rubenes.”<sup>7</sup> This copy was probably the picture listed in the collection of Don Diego de Altamirano (see Doc. 35, no. 55), where it was valued by Puga himself at 2,000 reales, higher than any other picture in the collection. The picture may have been given to Altamirano, who was a close friend, one of Aarschot's executors, and the author of a defense of the duc. It may be identifiable with the copy in the Hermitage, St. Petersburg (240 x 363.5 cm.), a painting with an eighteenth-century provenance about which very little is known.<sup>8</sup>

In 1800, Ceán Bermúdez mentioned a set of six genre paintings signed and dated by Puga in 1653 (perhaps a mistake for 1635) in the Madrid collection of Don Silvestre Collar y Castro, Secretary of the Council of Indies.<sup>9</sup> A group of five genre paintings valued in Aarschot's gallery are worth mentioning in this context. These relatively valuable paintings were listed as a painting of a blind guitarist, another of a knife and scissors grinder, a female tripe vendor, an oil seller, and another of a tavern with wine being sold and smokers. Although they were unattributed and their sizes were not given, the unusual subject matter of three of them corresponds with genre paintings carrying a traditional attribution to Puga: a Knife Grinder (St. Petersburg, Hermitage), an Oil Vendor (Castres, Musée Goya) and a Tavern Scene with Wine Selling and Smokers (Pontevedra, Museo).<sup>10</sup> The paintings were sold on 7 October 1641 to one Don Juan de Velasco for 600 reales each.<sup>11</sup> A further picture of a negro grinding chocolate listed in Aarschot's inventory may well be the picture of this subject that was later known to be in the possession of Don Diego de Altamirano (Doc. 35, no. 59). It does not appear to have formed part of the set of five other genre pictures. It is not certain, however, that the latter formed a series by a single hand.

One of the most interesting genre pictures in Aarschot's collection was a portrait of a member of his own household, inventoried as "the bodegón where the steward of his excellency is portrayed" (el bodegon donde esta Retrutado El desPensero de ssu ex.<sup>a</sup> con moldura de pino dada de negro).<sup>12</sup> In the valuation of the paintings, the sitter was said to be cutting beef, with mutton and a goat, and the picture was worth the large sum of 1,100 reales (no. 36). It was bought, along with four other pictures, on 3 October 1641, by Pedro de Tapia, porter of the Council of Italy, and the sitter's name was given as Mundin ("otro de un despensero que se llama mundin").<sup>13</sup> This painting may have had some relationship with the anonymous genre masterpiece painted in Madrid in the 1630s called the Bodegón Keeper (Amsterdam, Rijksmuseum), in which the figure of the cook is clearly painted from a live model.<sup>14</sup>

Juan de la Corte (ca. 1597–ca. 1660) was a Flemish painter who had been affiliated with the court since 1615 and who specialized in painting biblical, historical, and mythological subjects with small figures, sometimes with elaborate perspectival settings, as well as scenes from contemporary life at court. Aarschot may have become interested in De la Corte because of his Flemish background, although the artist's great popularity among collectors is attested to by the number of his works cited in seventeenth-century inventories. In the duc's accounts for 2 January, 24 April, and 12 July 1638, payments totaling 1,140 reales were made to De la Corte for unspecified paintings.<sup>15</sup> Perhaps these included the equestrian royal portraits "of all the house of Austria" by Juan de la Corte with landscapes painted by Puga, of which Camilo Guidi informed the Duca di Modena in a letter of 20 November 1641, adding that these artists were the most esteemed for this work at court and that their price was 180 ducats each.<sup>16</sup> The paintings were probably commissioned directly from the artists by Aarschot, and were perhaps a pointed and poignant demonstration of his loyalty to the Spanish Crown.

A set of eight equestrian portraits of members of the House of Austria, worth 3,600 reales, was listed in the first of Aarschot's rooms to be appraised. Two further sets of equestrian portraits of European princes, comprising 12 and 20 pictures, respectively, were listed as decorating the quarters of two members of Aarschot's household. The document specified that eight of these representing the Spanish Habsburgs were to remain together as a single group (Philip I, Charles V, Philip II, Philip III, Philip IV, Cardinal Infante Don Ferdinand, Infante Don Carlos, and Prince Baltasar Carlos). Puga may have painted some of these portraits, as his studio inventory listed sketches for equestrian portraits of Philip IV and the Cardinal Infante, as well as the Conde-Duque de Olivares.<sup>17</sup>

A set of 13 full-length royal portraits owned by Aarschot were valuable paintings, worth 880 reales each. Another set of 39 full-lengths comprised the Spanish Habsburgs, European royals and nobles, and the Conde-Duque de Olivares; they were worth 660 reales each. The most intriguing royal portrait of all in the collection was a large and valuable (2,000 reales) picture of Queen Isabella of Bourbon, inventoried in the duquesa's household (no. 15), which depicted the queen and her ladies-in-waiting passing through a room represented in perspective, its walls adorned with portraits of the Spanish queens. This painting's subject matter and large size (3½ x 2 varas and 3 dedos) make it a suggestive precedent for Velázquez's Las Meninas. The painting may have been by Juan de la Corte, who painted group portraits of the royal family in perspectival and garden settings.<sup>18</sup>

Very few of the paintings in Aarschot's inventories were attributed. About one-quarter of the collection was made up of still lifes, flower paintings, and genre pictures. Some 50 paintings hung in the galeria: large hunting scenes, landscapes, still lifes, a mythology, and a set of genre pictures. Aarschot bought Spanish pictures while in Madrid, and the documents list works attributed to Francisco de Collantes and Eugenio Caxés, including one listed in the inventory which may have been a self-portrait ("otro quadro de una Caveca y pintura de medio cuerpo con marco negro que se dice es Una cabeza de un pintor Eujenio cajes").<sup>19</sup> However, their descriptions suggest that the majority of his paintings were of Flemish origin, and may have been drawn from his collection in Brussels. A number of flower and landscape paintings attributed to Brueghel were probably by Jan "Velvet" Brueghel, and one Night Scene with St. Jerome was by Abraham Bloemart. The set of accounts of Aarschot's expenses in Spain between 1633–1640<sup>20</sup> lists payments of 1,600 reales on 9 November and 5 December 1639, for six unspecified paintings that Gaspar de Crayer ("Gaspar van Ecre") was painting for the duc,<sup>21</sup> another 900 reales paid on 2 January 1639<sup>22</sup> and a further 500 reales on 10 April 1639.<sup>23</sup>

Although personal enmity existed between Aarschot and Peter Paul Rubens, his collection included a famous example of the artist's early work, his enormous Wolf Hunt now in the Metropolitan Museum (Fig. 32), which hung with other large hunting scenes in Aarschot's gallery (no. 65). There was also a copy of a Nativity of Christ by Rubens<sup>24</sup> and a number of prints after his paintings and those of Jacob Jordeans, which were probably those bought in Antwerp on behalf of the duc in 1638 and July 1640.<sup>25</sup> Rubens had painted the Wolf Hunt on speculation ca. 1615–16, and Aarschot, who was grand falconer of the Netherlands and chief huntsman of Flanders, had bought it in 1616–17, probably having the work shipped to Spain with other pictures from his collection after his confinement.<sup>26</sup> Aarschot's interest in Flemish hunting pictures is also reflected in his purchase of hunts and subjects from Aesop's Fables by Paul de Vos between 1633 and 1640.<sup>27</sup> He also commissioned 24 paintings from Peter Snayers.<sup>28</sup> Some of these may have been sold to the Marqués de Povar. A sale of an unspecified number of paintings to Povar is recorded in Aarschot's accounts for 1638,<sup>29</sup> and the inventory of Gerónima Dávila y Guzmán, Marquesa de Povar, of 17 September 1641 lists 25 pictures of animals and six of birds bought from the Duque de Aarschot.<sup>30</sup>

Aarschot's collection included some Italian pictures, and his accounts mention six paintings sent from Genoa in March 1640, whose authors and subjects are unspecified.<sup>31</sup> However, his overriding taste for pictures from his native land is confirmed by a shipment of 38 paintings sent from Flanders, which reached Madrid after Arenberg's death and were inventoried on 11 May 1641 (Doc. 30).<sup>32</sup> These paintings included subjects from biblical and classical history, mythologies, genre paintings, hunting scenes, flower paintings (one an original of Brueghel), and still lifes (two of which were originals by Alexander Adriaensen). They were valued in different rooms in his palace by Puga and De la Corte in August 1641.

Aarschot's estate sale, which began on 10 September 1641, was well attended by picture collectors in Madrid and also attracted international attention. The Duca di Modena was interested in acquiring 14 of Aarschot's hunting scenes by Paul de Vos. His ambassador in Madrid, Camilo Guidi, consulted Velázquez about their quality, but was warned that he would be competing with the Marqués de Leganés for the purchase of these works.<sup>33</sup> Indeed, Leganés's spectacular collection of Flemish paintings included more than 70 such works by Vos and Frans Snyder, among others.

In Flanders Aarschot had come to know the Marqués de Leganés, President of the Supreme Council of Flanders and the greatest collector of Flemish art at the Spanish court. An Equestrian Portrait of Leganés in Aarschot's collection, which may have been painted while Leganés was in the north, was hung with five other equestrian portraits of Flemish and Italian nobles (nos. 77). The two men shared a common interest in Flemish art, which ranged from major artists to such “minor” masters as the still-life painter Alexander Adriansen, six of whose works Leganés bequeathed to the king.<sup>34</sup> On his arrival in Madrid at the end of 1633, Aarschot was lodged in Leganés’ Madrid palace, which he described as a paradise on earth.<sup>35</sup> Early in 1634, Aarschot had the States General pay for expensive copies of eight Flemish paintings that Leganés had been obliged to give to the king to furnish the Buen Retiro palace.

Not surprisingly, Leganés bought significant pictures from Aarschot’s collection at his estate auction in 1641. These included a group of four still lifes of laid tables that hung in Aarschot’s gallery, two of which were identified as Dutch paintings in the inventory.<sup>36</sup> It is likely that Dutch still lifes in Madrid collections, as well as more common Flemish works, were an important influence on the still-life paintings of Antonio de Pereda. Leganés bought these four pictures on 7 October 1641, for 1,200 reales each (“quatro bodegones con mesas pintadas y bidrios”),<sup>37</sup> and they were inventoried in his own collection in 1655 as four Dutch still lifes valued at only 500 reales each. The most important of all Leganés’ purchases was the large Wolf Hunt by Peter Paul Rubens now in New York. This painting was valued at 6,600 reales, revalued at 550 ducats, and sold to Leganés on 7 October 1641 for 4,400 reales.<sup>38</sup> Leganés also acquired five other large hunting pieces that had hung in Aarschot’s gallery: a tiger hunt that he bought on 7 October 1641 for 2,750 reales,<sup>39</sup> three of wolves, dogs, and other animals, and a picture of a fowl hunt. All of these pictures were listed in Leganés’ inventories of 1642 and 1655.<sup>40</sup> The Wolf Hunt was appraised in his collection in 1655 at 2,200 reales, which was considerably less than its sale price fourteen years earlier.

The sale of goods from the Duc d’Aarschot’s estate had begun on 10 September 1641.<sup>41</sup> His executors experienced some difficulty, however, in selling paintings from the collection on the open market in Madrid. Puga and De la Corte lowered the reserve prices of some of the unsold pictures in a revaluation of 8 December 1641.<sup>42</sup> Furthermore, the artist-appraisers authorized a further reduction of these values by one-third and even one-half if they remained unsold after three months from this date, attributing the difficulty of their sale to “the lack of money that there is in these miserable times” (“la falta de dineros que ay en estos miseros tiempos”).<sup>43</sup>

44. Rubens' Wolf Hunt (Fig. 32) in the Metropolitan Museum (10.73) was purchased by the Marqués de Leganes from Arenberg's collection in 1641 for 4,400 reales.

The following list of paintings is extracted from the itemized dowry (valued at 10,004 ducats) brought by Isabel Ramírez de Vargas, daughter of Don Diego Ramírez de Vargas, a knight of the Order of Alcántara, and Leonarda de Valeriola y Covarrubios, to her marriage to a Florentine gentleman, Don Jerónimo Bifi. While a small number of devotional paintings were commonly included in dowry agreements of the non-aristocratic classes, it is more unusual to find attributed works of considerable value included in such documents of this period.

Although the majority of the paintings were of religious subjects, four of the older works were landscapes (no. 18). The most valuable painting of all was a genre picture, listed as an original depicting a Fowl Vendor (no. 15), apparently an old work by the same hand as two panels representing Herodias and a Calvary (nos. 13, 14). A curious aspect of this document is the large number of works by a single hand which the bride's father included in her dowry. Two paintings were possibly imported from Italy (nos. 12, 16), but most of the paintings were religious subjects painted in Madrid by Eugenio Caxés. These were listed with the important qualification that they were "originals," and many were works of considerable value. One explanation for this is that it may have been felt that paintings by an artist of Tuscan extraction were appropriate for a Florentine son-in-law.

Don Rodrigo de Herrera (Medina del Campo 1578–1641 Madrid) was the illegitimate son of Melchor de Herrera, 1st Marqués de Auñón and Tesorero General de Su Magestad, and Inés Ponce de León.<sup>1</sup> In the absence of male heirs from Melchor de Herrera's marriages, Don Rodrigo inherited his father's mayorazgo and became a Knight of the Order of Santiago in 1625. He lived in a house on the fashionable calle de Alcalá in front of the convent of San Hermenegildo. He appears to have derived a considerable income from the rental and sale of properties at court. The Marqués de Montesclaros lived in a house bought from Herrera, and Herrera rented quarters to the Duchesse d'Aarschot and her son in the Casa de las Siete Chimeneas, opposite the convent of the Discalced Carmelites on the calle de Alcalá.<sup>2</sup>

Herrera's postmortem inventory, begun on 23 November 1641, was drawn up by his executors, who were his sister Doña Ana de Herrera y Ribera, Marquesa de Auñón; Fray Juan de Herrera, of the Order of Saint Dominic; and D. Alonso de Villarroel, Knight of Alcántara. Herrera's picture collection of some 138 works was appraised for auction by two painters, Antonio de Puga and Diego Polo (ca. 1610–ca. 1655), on 29 November 1641. The paintings that remained unsold were revalued by another painter, Julián González, on 10 January 1642. Despite the combined expertise of these artists, the only attributed pictures were 18 copies after Bassano, which included representations of the Last Supper, The Creation, and Allegories of the Seasons. Herrera's will shows that he had loaned some 30 paintings and some furniture to the Duque de Osuna and borrowed from the Príncipe de Esquilache eight small paintings to decorate his villa and garden outside town at Canillejas, which had belonged to Esquilache.<sup>3</sup>

In Herrera's last will and testament, he declared that he owned 180 paintings that decorated la galeria and other rooms of his house, some of which were very valuable and some of which were not hung since they were "deshonestos".<sup>4</sup> Herrera's postmortem inventory reveals that his picture collection was indeed unusual for the small number of religious subjects it contained. Only 15 religious paintings were listed, of which two were copies and three were landscapes. Against this was a high percentage of secular works, which were also the most valuable holdings. A picture described as a painter portraying a nude woman (no. 34) was revalued as "apeles Retratando a una diosa" and sold at auction to Don Rodrigo Yañez on 20 January 1642 as "apeles retratando a su muger". Representing Apelles and Campaspe, this classical subject set the whole tenor of Herrera's remarkable collection of nude paintings. Moreover, the majority of the 18 identifiable mythological subjects in the collection probably depicted the female nude. These paintings included representations of the stories of Venus and Mars, Venus and Cupid, Diana and Actaeon, Danae and the Shower of Gold, and Leda and the Swan. The figure of Venus was identified in seven of the paintings. A further eight pictures of unidentified women (one seated with Cupid, two pictures of women lying on a bed, another of a woman lying in a landscape, and three with women bathing) are likely also to have represented nude or semi-nude figures, perhaps goddesses. At Herrera's auction on 16 December 1641, the painter Jean Ducamps, known in Spain as Juan del Campo, purchased mythological pictures representing the stories of Venus, Diana, and Leda, which were listed without any veneer of erudition as "five paintings of nude women". In fact, the notary, and perhaps the artist-appraisers, appear to have experienced some difficulty in identifying the story of Leda and the Swan: one picture was listed simply as a woman lying down with a swan (no. 56), while another was a nude woman lying down with a goose (no. 42)<sup>5</sup> and another much less valuable painting was a standing woman embracing a goose (no. 43).

In his will, Herrera stipulated that his collection be sold in Italy rather than Spain. Acutely aware of the prevailing inhibitions in Spain regarding such paintings, perhaps he feared they would be confiscated by the Inquisition or perhaps he felt he could expect better prices on the more liberal art market abroad. The fact that nine of the paintings with nudes had to be reduced in value for sale at a second auction of Herrera's goods would seem to substantiate this consideration. The bulk of Herrera's picture collection, however, was sold at the public auction of his belongings, beginning on 6 December 1641. Among the more distinguished purchasers were the Duque de Maqueda (landscapes, religious subjects, mythologies, and genre paintings), Camilo Guidi, the Modenese Ambassador (a set of 12 equestrian portraits of Emperors), and the royal secretary Martín de Medina Lasso de Vega (paintings of the Seasons and a set of 12 portraits of the House of Austria). Paintings that remained unsold were reappraised at lower reserves by the painter Julian González on 10 January 1642 for a further estate sale resumed on 14 January 1642; these included three profane subjects sold to Don Rodrigo Yañez (Bath of Diana, Apeles portraying Campaspe, and a small painting of nude goddesses).

Some of Herrera's mythologies were clearly valuable gallery paintings, while others were more decorative in nature and served as overwindows (nos. 19, 23). The most valuable mythologies were a painting depicting Fame and Mercury Teaching Cupid to Read (no. 16) and another of Venus and Mars (no. 37), worth 1,100 and 2,200 reales, respectively. The fact that the latter work was described as an "original," an independent composition by the hand of a master, partly accounts for its high value and distinguished it from the rest of the mythologies, some of which were almost certainly copies. Not surprisingly, the painting was acquired at auction by a noble collector, the Duque de Maqueda, for 1,650 reales (10 December 1641). Herrera owned five genre paintings, four of which depicted female figures engaged in everyday activities. The most valuable of these represented a bodegón of fish with a woman and child in her arms. Three others may have been pendants, depicting a woman peeling an apple, washing a goose, and weighing fruit, respectively. Although such activities seem innocuous enough, Herrera clearly had a predilection for erotic subjects and may have enjoyed the sexual overtones in these genre scenes. A painting of Lot and His Daughters (no. 28) may also have appealed to him for this reason.

Pedro van Vucht was a Flemish merchant resident at the court of Madrid. In 1642 he married Juana Lucia López Pueyo, daughter of Vicente López, and drew up a document of appraisal of his capital assets brought to the union on 6 April 1642, as was customary for a second marriage. His total moveable assets were worth some 434,632 reales.

Van Vucht's paintings were appraised by the French painter Jean Ducamps (ca.1600–1650), known in Spain as Juan del Campo, the name with which he signed this document. The choice of this artist, who also worked for the Duc d'Aarschot, may have seemed appropriate to a Flemish collector, whose collection included important northern pictures. Del Campo may have been a prominent personality among collectors of Flemish art in Madrid, and the Marqués de Leganés gave him a seascape painted by Paul Bril.<sup>1</sup> The picture frames were valued by the Flemish cabinet-maker Abraham Lers (Abraham Leerse), who had built the frame for Rubens' Martyrdom of St. Andrew, the altarpiece of the Chapel of the Madrid Hospital de los Flamencos.<sup>2</sup>

Not surprisingly, perhaps, the only attributed works in Pedro van Vucht's inventory of capital were by Flemish masters, although some of these are difficult to identify today. The most highly valued picture in the collection, a Descent from the Cross probably by Jacob Jordaens (no. 1), was first in the document. Two other important northern works were allegories of the Five Senses and Four Elements by Gerardo (?) (nos. 4,5). Three landscapes with animals and birds by another obscure painter, one Pedro de Berois(?), were said to have hung over windows (no. 9). A painting of a lion hunt (no. 36) was another subject painted by northern specialists, which were much sought after by collectors in Madrid. The collection of his brother Jan van Vucht in 1628 listed two Rubens hunting scenes, one of lions and the other of leopards.<sup>3</sup> Van Vucht's four landscapes copied after paintings by the Bassani reflect the almost universal admiration for such images in seventeenth-century Spain. One would also like to know the name of the painter of Van Vucht's full-length portrait (no. 8) and another smaller portrait of this sitter (no. 33).

2. This painting had been bequeathed in 1639 by the will of Jan van Vucht, who was the Madrid agent of Balthasar Moretus's printing works. See H. Vlieghe, Saints I, Corpus Rubenianum Ludwig Burchard VIII, London and New York, 1972, p. 89.

3. AHPM, Prot. 5.185, ff. 403–425 for the inventory of Jan van Vucht drawn up on the death of his wife, María Blist, opened on 20 March 1628. The Rubens paintings were listed as “dos liencos de Rubbens el Uno cassa de leones y el otro de lupardes,” worth 1,200 reales. The only other attributed paintings were two paintings of Europa and her nymphs and Jupiter and the gods by “banbal”.

The lawyer licenciado Don Diego de Altamirano had served in the council of finance (Consejo de Hacienda), was a member of the Royal Council, and was fiscal in the Supreme Council of Justice. On 15 January 1642 he was appointed fiscal of the Council of Castile, with the expectation of becoming a member of the Council. He died in Madrid on 8 March 1642, and his inventory was drawn up by his widow, Leonor María Altamirano, with his extensive library itemized, beginning on 15 March 1642. His picture collection was appraised by the painter Antonio de Puga on 16 June 1642. It was said at the time of his death that Altamirano left his children in financial difficulty.<sup>1</sup>

Altamirano was a close friend of the Duc d'Aarschot. He acted as one of the executors of his last will and testament, drawn up before the notary of the Council of Justice, and (with the permission of Philip IV) wrote a Defense of Don Felipe de Aremberg.<sup>2</sup> The inventory of his picture collection contained a portrait of the duc seated in a chair, along with a full-length portrait of Altamirano himself. The fact that these did not appear in the appraisal of his paintings suggests that they were reserved for his heirs. Altamirano also bought paintings of the Four Seasons, a portrait of Aarschot's grandfather, and a picture of Christ from Aarschot's auction.<sup>3</sup>

Another of the paintings in Altamirano's collection that came from Aarschot's collection was an unusual genre painting, A Negro Grinding Chocolate (no. 59). His taste for Flemish paintings may have been influenced by Aarschot, and he owned five large hunting scenes, a specialty of Flemish artists, whose subjects were specified in the inventory as hunts of wolves, boar, lions, deer, and a tiger. One of these was a full-sized copy of the enormous Wolf Hunt by Rubens (no. 55), the only attributed work in the inventory, which was probably the copy made by Antonio de Puga after the original owned by Aarschot. Puga, who appraised the paintings, valued this more highly than any other picture in the collection.

The bracketed information in no. 39 comes from the fuller description of the picture given in the inventory.

The postmortem inventory/valuation of the estate of Magdalena Melgarejo, wife of Juan de Clavijo, secretary of the Consejo de la Suprema y General Inquisición, was begun in Madrid on 15 October 1642, with the appraisal of paintings (ff. 836–838v) undertaken by the royal painter Angelo Nardi on 2 November 1642.

Nardi's valuation was headed by six paintings by El Greco appraised as a single entity in the collection. These were followed by a number of religious subjects, including four paintings of the Ecce Homo (nos. 8, 9, 15). The secular subjects were listed separately, beginning with a series of 17 landscapes by a painter nicknamed "el Bastardo" (no. 18). Clavijo's occupation as secretary to the Consejo de la Inquisición perhaps explains the presence of only one mythological subject (no. 19) in the collection, as well as "official" royal portraits of the king, queen, and Prince Baltasar Carlos (nos. 35). However, Clavijo's 42 portraits of popes (no. 32) was a rather old-fashioned set of images by this date. The collection contained a number of conventional secular images, such as the two sets of the Seasons (nos. 21, 25), fruit still lifes (no. 23), and Flemish landscapes (no. 30). There were also less common subjects, such as the pair of paintings representing Lent and Carnival (nos. 20), perhaps depicting still-life objects appropriate to these times of year, and a painting of carnival festivities (no. 31). Indicative perhaps of this collector's serious and moralizing cast of mind, there was a small painting of a book (no. 34), perhaps symbolic of the "vanity" of learning, and a small Vanitas painting listed by its Spanish seventeenth-century term a "desengaño" or "undeceiving of the world" (no. 26).

The postmortem inventory of Don Nicolás de Cardona, Maestro de la Cámara Real, was drawn up by his widow, Leonor María Fontana, and the licenciado Don Marcelino Favia y Guzmán, and begun on 4 January 1643. The document is an important record of the picture collection of a high-ranking courtier of the reign of Philip IV, and itemizes works in the rooms of Cardona's Madrid house.

It is not surprising that a courtier who served in the king's private chamber, and who occupied the status of Cardona in the palace hierarchy, should display in his home a portrait series of the Spanish royal family from the Emperor Charles V to the reigning king Philip IV, and the Conde-Duque de Olivares (nos. 1–8). Other portraits of European royalty listed at different points in the inventory were to be found in other rooms in the house. Cardona's office (nos. 45–51) was decorated with portraits of Roman Emperors, the Four Continents, eight Provinces, a portrait, three still lifes, and a figure perhaps representing Justice; the latter image perhaps provided an ideal "guide" in the performance of Cardona's official duties.

The dining room was decorated with mythological subjects, nudes, and the portraits of a gypsy girl and Venetian women, perhaps because these were pictures of good quality to be seen by guests. Perhaps too these were considered fitting decoration in the sense that the aesthetic and sensory pleasure provided was analogous to the pleasures of the table. Other pictures here were landscapes, still lifes, and paintings of the Seasons, nature subjects that directly related to the consumption of food. Cardona's own portrait hung in his bedroom (no. 64), along with portraits of the Cardinal-Infante, Charles V, and six personifications of the Liberal Arts. In the context of this room, it might not be too farfetched to interpret the painting of a lioness lately delivered of a cub (no. 68) as a pun on the name of his wife, Leonora.

Cardona's collection comprised a significant number of religious paintings, including a representation of the militant Counter-Reformation subject of the Triumph of the Church (no. 32), perhaps related to Rubens' tapestries for the Madrid convent of the Encarnación, and a portrait of Raymund Llull (no. 34).

However, Cardona's paintings show a wide variety of subject matter, which reflects a broader and, perhaps, more informed interest in paintings than some of his contemporaries. Although paintings of female nudes were risqué subjects in private collections of the day, Cardona owned two paintings of nude nymphs (nos. 35, 57) and a nude Turkish lady (no. 60), as well as a Flemish nymph (no. 26). There was an erotic mythology of Venus and Vulcan embracing (no. 53), which perhaps had comic overtones, and was perhaps complemented by the subject of the aforementioned painting representing a nude nymph and an old man (no. 35). Two other mythologies in landscape settings represented the story of Pyramus and Thisbe (no. 16) and Orpheus (no. 55). There was a representation of Springtime (no. 38) and a number of genre subjects on panel in black ebony frames which may have been Flemish pictures, including depictions of blind men (no. 36), figures playing (no. 37), and a landscape with a Fleming smoking (no. 42). A painting of a barber removing calluses from a patient was probably a comic work (no. 44).

Pedro de Arce was born in Madrid and was baptized in the parish of San Miguel on 1 March 1607.<sup>1</sup> His father was Don Juan II de Arce, a native of the small mountain village of Espinosa de los Monteros, which guards the passes between Burgos and the northern coastal province of Santander. His mother, Doña Juana Bautista Portilla, came from Alcalá de Henares.<sup>2</sup> Arce himself described his forebears as being “en posesión de personas hijos de algo nobles” – that is, he was descended from what the English would call the gentry.<sup>3</sup> Arce’s father (or grandfather) may have been the Juan de Arze, platero, who was recorded among those giving donativos to Philip IV in 1625.<sup>4</sup> Regardless, Don Pedro maintained close connections with silver, gold, and jewelry merchants throughout his life.<sup>5</sup>

Natives of Espinosa de los Monteros held the privilege of serving as one of the monteros de cámara (also given as monteros de guarda). This office, which apparently descended from some sort of alpine troops, as the suffix de guarda indicates, should probably not be equated with that of royal huntsman, which the modern meaning of the word montero suggests. At any rate, by the seventeenth century the post was in fact more ceremonial than military. Arce’s contemporary, Nuñez de Castro, tells us that the forty monteros y guardas del cámara del Rey attended upon and slept near the royal bedchambers and that they received great privileges, apparently including the right to sell offices (títulos de leales).<sup>6</sup> Most importantly, the monteros lived essentially tax-free, being particularly exempt on the alcabala tax on any goods which they sold. Although the salary for the post was relatively low – only 725 reales per year, of which only 703 were actually paid, when payment could be secured at all<sup>7</sup> – the tax exemption and other privileges, as well as the proximity to the king’s person and therefore to royal power and court appointments, made being a montero de cámara extremely attractive. Thus, Arce, in 1643, bought one of the forty positions from Don Juan de Rozzo or Rozas Escalera (Santiago) for 1,200 ducats, or more than eighteen years’ salary.<sup>8</sup> Arce’s pruebas de sangre were certified and the case reviewed and (presumably) approved by 18–21 August 1643.<sup>9</sup>

Like Velázquez, Arce worked his way up the court hierarchy. He was also an ensayador de la casa de la moneda – an assayer and inspector in the Royal Mint, an office that was only marginally compatible with Arce’s status as an hidalgo. (It would later cause difficulties for his son’s nomination to a military order.)<sup>10</sup> In 1664, Don Pedro applied for the position of guardajoyas, an office that would have proved particularly lucrative to anyone with Arce’s connections in the jewelry industry. Arce was apparently passed over for the post, but in transmitting Arce’s request to the Bureo, or palace executive committee, Philip IV indicated that he knew Arce fairly well, insisting that the Bureo consult with the king “about the merits of Arce’s services and parts” whenever the king should come “to propose subjects for him.”<sup>11</sup> As Arce had already become an important collector by this time, we may speculate that his taste for art was among the “parts” that recommended him to the king.

In 1676, Arce is described as a procurador en Cortes (a solicitor or representative) of the parish of Santa Cruz in Madrid; some time before, he had also become an aposentador of the palace.<sup>12</sup> Arce probably obtained the latter position in 1667, when he petitioned the king to transfer his office of montero to his son, Don Pedro Ignacio de Arce.<sup>13</sup> Other documents locate Don Pedro’s homes during this same period: he is said to have lived on the Calle del Barrionuevo in 1642 and on the Calle de las Carretas, in the houses of Don Pedro de Velasco, Capellán de honor to the king, in 1651. Arce’s death date is not known, but he seems to have still been alive at the time of his son’s admission into the Order of Santiago in 1678; he would have been seventy-one years old in that year.

Investigations into Arce's history are complicated by the existence of many people with the same family name in seventeenth-century Madrid. What is more, a second Pedro de Arce – a contemporary of the collector – played a prominent role in the government circles of the Conde-Duque de Olivares.<sup>14</sup> Since Arce lived so long into the lifetime of his son, Don Pedro Ignacio, there exists the possibility of further confusion, although this has not yet been a problem. The son is, however, of some interest in his own right. In addition to inheriting his father's positions at court and in the Mint, he would presumably have inherited the picture collection as well. Furthermore, Pedro Ignacio was a playwright and counted the famous dramatist, Calderón de la Barca, among his friends. Calderón, in fact, testified in the younger Arce's behalf during his pruebas de sangre in 1678.<sup>15</sup>

Don Pedro de Arce was married at least twice. His first wife, whom he married on 20 December 1642 (when he was already thirty-five years old), was Doña María Tufiño de Vallejo, the widow of Don Tomás de Rueda, a jewelry merchant who had died in 1637.<sup>16</sup> Doña María herself died on or before 17 March 1657 (see Doc. 66). Inventories taken at the time of Rueda's death, at the time of Arce and Doña María's wedding in 1643, and at Doña María's death in 1657 are all preserved in the Madrid archives. Also preserved are the documents relating to Arce's second marriage, in 1664, to Doña Luisa Ordóñez de Rueda, widow of Don Antonio de Oviedo y Herrera of the Order of Santiago (see Doc. 82). These documents include Arce's 1664 inventory, which was published in part by Caturla, and a 1666 inventory of paintings and other goods that came into Arce's power as part of his second wife's dowry. Taken together, the documents not only outline the history of Arce's collection, but also provide valuable insights into the financial and private lives of an "upper middle class" seventeenth-century family.

Although Arce's wealth could hardly be compared to that of the great nobles, it was nevertheless quite substantial. For example, at the time of Arce's first marriage in 1643, his personal estate was appraised at nearly two million maravedíes, or about 5,000 ducats. His first wife brought him nearly a million maravedíes in her dowry, and her sons by her first husband brought several millions more into the common household, to be held in trust by Arce until they were of age. The value of the entire combined estate in 1657 was over ten million maravedíes (over 27,000 ducats), of which Don Pedro's portion was 5,530,467.50 maravedíes (over 14,000 ducats, including the assets he had brought to his marriage in 1643). By 1664, at the time of his second marriage, Arce's net worth was estimated at 316,718 reales de vellón and 520,704 reales de plata. That is, he possessed an estate of 66,000 to 75,000 ducats. Of course, this included investments yielding yearly income – his salary, rents, debts collectible, and the like – which were appraised at arbitrary values, as in the case of his office of montero de cámara, appraised at the purchase price of 1,200 ducats depending on whether the deflationary decree of 1664 had actually taken place. Nevertheless, Arce's wealth was for the most part in cash (nearly 4,600 ducats, all in silver) or, more remarkably, in jewels (nearly 29,000 ducats), which Arce could sell without paying tax, as a result of the privileges inherent in his office of montero de cámara. Since this was at a time when the large noble estates were increasingly encumbered by debts and by the costs of maintaining large households, and mainly consisted in any case of rents and agricultural income, in terms of liquid assets Arce was able to keep up with the grandees in the same court circles.

It seems clear that the ultimate source of Arce's wealth was commerce in jewels, silverware, and other precious objects. Whether or not Arce's father was in fact the platero mentioned in the documents,<sup>17</sup> Arce's wife was certainly the widow of a jewel merchant. It could hardly have been a coincidence that Arce's first marriage preceded, and the receipt his wife's sizeable dowry coincided with, his certification as montero de cámara, an office that had cost him nearly a fifth of his estate. What is more, the five- to sevenfold increase in his wealth between 1657 and 1664 must surely have included an inheritance, presumably from someone with a great many jewels and silver. We know that Arce sold jewels to the Marqués de la Capilla during 1654–57,<sup>18</sup> and that he and his second wife rented out a store on the Calle Mayor to a jewelry merchant named Juan Mateo in the 1660s.<sup>19</sup> Furthermore, at the time of the pruebas de sangre for his son's admission into the Order of Santiago, Arce was said to have always exercised his post as Assayer of the Royal Mint with a sword at his side, to demonstrate that he was neither a platero nor an artesano – the implication being that he might otherwise have been thought a platero. Arce also functioned as a businessman, managing his own properties along with those of his two wives and their children.

An unusual and, as Caturla has noted,<sup>20</sup> somewhat touching insight into Arce's handling of his wives' business affairs is provided by a passage in his first wife's will, which reads as follows:

I likewise declare that the aforesaid Don Pedro de Arce ... has not yet authorized a receipt for my dowry because the dowry goods which entered into his power have not been sufficiently liquidated, and this because although in the estate portion (hijuela) of the aforesaid partition between myself and my sons by my first marriage different quantities and effects were judicially given over to me, many of them have turned out to be uncertain, and Don Pedro has not been able to secure payment of them, in spite of the diligent actions which he has taken. And other portions of my dowry were already paid up and spent at the time at which my second marriage, to the aforesaid Don Pedro de Arce, was contracted, and Don Pedro, with great care and many expenses and personal oversight, has been able to attain the setting in good order of many of the aforesaid properties, and if it had not been for his assistance, expense, and intelligence – having given in every way what he had to the common household – the properties would have been lost.<sup>21</sup>

Doña María's will is of further interest for the light it sheds both on Don Pedro's personality and on his complicated family situation, which occasionally affected his collecting activities. Doña María obviously had a great deal of affection for Don Pedro, since in place of the usual formulas ("my most dear and loving husband" and the like), her will speaks of "the great satisfaction" which she had had in Don Pedro. She repeatedly exhorts her sons by her first marriage to come to a peaceful settlement with Don Pedro, avoiding lawsuits and unpleasanties, and declares that "Don Pedro will not defraud the aforesaid my sons in anything which would pertain to them and ought to be theirs."

Doña María's exhortations were apparently needed, since the records of the 1657 partition of her estate between Arce and his stepsons are extremely complicated. In the first place, the settlement papers take up an entire protocol (a volume of more than 1,000 pages) – that is, an amount of notarial space usually reserved for the partition of large noble estates.<sup>22</sup> The very extent of these proceedings, and the meticulous care with which pertinent financial data were recorded, suggest that Arce and his wards may have been bickering over details of the inheritance. On the other hand, the disarray in which Arce found his wife's property and the complicated legal situation of an estate held in trust for the heirs of a previous marriage may have led to a difficult partition even if all sides acted in the best of faith. In any case, Arce found himself owing over 1,300,000 maravedíes to his son and stepsons, and he was forced to turn over several paintings by Angelo Nardi to one of his wards in the later stages of the settlement.<sup>23</sup> By 1664, however, Arce's assets were more formidable, and he had bought these paintings back for his own collection.<sup>24</sup> Indeed, quite a few of the paintings and sculpture belonging outright to the Rueda heirs appear in Arce's inventory of 1664. Presumably, Arce had bought these pieces from his stepsons or otherwise prevented them from leaving his house. Furthermore, Arce appears to have learned from his experience: we will see that he was not only very careful to have his own estate in good order upon contracting his second marriage but also may even have manipulated property values to obtain a more favorable financial status for himself in the new common household.

The postmortem inventory of Antonio Balbi, Genoese merchant and banker, was drawn up by the Genoese ambassador in Madrid, Constantin Doria, Bartolomé Garbarino, and Don Juan Francisco Balbi, beginning in Madrid on 31 October 1643. Balbi's pictures were appraised on 3 December by two painters, Jerónimo de la Cruz y Mendoza and Francisco Fernández. Although Balbi owned only a few paintings, a mere 19 works, some were of considerable value, such as St. John the Baptist pointing upwards (no. 1) and a large Assumption of the Virgin (no. 5), both valued at 2,000 reales each. Pablo Justiniano, another Genoese at court, willed a painting of the Magdalene to Balbi (Doc. 19, no. 10). Most of the paintings were of religious subjects, including three of St. John the Baptist (nos. 1, 2, 3) and a pair of paintings representing Judith and Holofernes and Samson and Delilah (nos. 7, 8). However, Balbi also owned a painting of Cleopatra (no. 13), perhaps an erotic representation, and another less valuable picture of the goddess Diana (no. 17). As a demonstration of his loyalty to the Spanish Crown, Balbi had a portrait of Philip IV (no. 19), as well as a representation of his home town of Genoa (no. 14).

In 1644 an inventory was taken of the paintings owned by a royal accountant (contador de resultas) Domingo Soria Arteaga, an official in the Contaduría general de cuentas de resultas, a body administering the finances of the Spanish crown. This document reveals him to have been an important collector of contemporary art. The inventory of the goods in Soria Arteaga's house on the calle de los Majadericos in central Madrid was begun on 9 June 1644, occasioned by the death of his wife Eugenia Enríquez Murtiel in childbirth on the previous day and the need to record the inheritance due to their seven small children. For the estate appraisal the painter Francisco de Burgos Mantilla was nominated to value the picture collection, which was undertaken on 20 October 1644.

When Soria Arteaga married Eugenia Enríquez Murtiel (at an unspecified date) he owned a collection of some 50 paintings, a number which had risen to ca. 150 in 1644. On 3 September 1644, Soria Arteaga drew up his wife's last will and testament,<sup>1</sup> which included a copy of the inventory of capital which he brought to their marriage (ff. 595–598). Here were listed 55 paintings, most of which correspond to numbers from the 1644 valuation. The capital also specifies that Soria Arteaga had exchanged a Sacrifice of Isaac and a Herodias for an Adoration of the Kings (“uno de los reyes que tengo al Presente”), and that he had exchanged a Conversion of the Magdalene for two still lifes of grapes, discussed below.

The fact that Soria Arteaga himself oversaw the inventory and valuation of his own picture collection probably accounts for the high incidence of attributed works in the document, in which 103 paintings, as well as six sculptures, are assigned artists' names. Soria Arteaga's collection contained full-length portraits of himself, his wife, and their son (no. 41), but these were unattributed works, as is so often the case with portraits in documents such as these. Some works were attributed to artists who are now difficult to identify. One of these is Don Gaspar de Chiriboga, who painted a religious subject and a portrait (nos. 15 and 59) and who may even have been an amateur artist. Another artist's name (“explanje”) may be garbled in the document (no. 35). Three other minor painters represented in the collection, Francisco Verjes (no. 40), Juan de Riaño (no. 16) and Teodisio Mingot (no. 36), were reputable artists in Madrid of the time, but whose paintings are unknown today. Mingot (ca.1570–1620) was a pupil of the famous artist Gaspar Becerra and worked in fresco at the Escorial, Alcázar and El Pardo; he was mentioned with praise by Carducho, Jusepe Martínez, and Palomino.<sup>2</sup>

Like many of his peers, Soria Arteaga owned copies of paintings by Titian (no. 44) and Bassano (nos. 7 and 50). Unusually for a collector of his social status, there were also works that were considered originals by artists as famous as Titian (no. 47), Leonardo (no. 43), Jan Brueghel (no. 48), and Rubens (no. 14). It is significant, however, that original paintings by contemporary Spanish artists active at court outnumbered those of any other school. This suggests that Soria Arteaga was not only an important collector on the Madrid art market, owning paintings by Juan Fernández de Navarrete (no. 19) and El Greco (no. 30), for instance, but an important patron of living painters, many of whom he may have known personally. He owned two important figure paintings by Pedro Núñez del Valle, the Resurrection of Lazarus (no. 2) and Moses and Pharaoh's Crown (no. 20). Francisco de Collantes was represented by Jacob and the Angel (no. 6), Fall of Troy (no. 31), and Conversion of Paul (no. 38). There was an Incarnation (no. 5) paired with an Immaculate Conception (no. 4) by Jusepe Leonardo, and a copy of one of his paintings of the Holy Family (no. 46), which suggests his work was particularly admired by Soria Arteaga. The most important painting by him in the collection was, however, the Moses and the Plague of Serpents (no. 21), valued by Burgos Mantilla at 1,500 reales, which could be the painting of this subject now in the Real Academia de

San Fernando in Madrid (Fig. 9), thought to have been painted by Leonardo around 1635–40.<sup>3</sup> This is clearly an ambitious history painting, containing a number of studies of the nude male, and was a work for which the artist may even have made a preparatory sketch.<sup>4</sup>

Soria Arteaga owned one painting by Pedro de Orrente (no. 28), an artist whose works were sought by almost all collectors of note in Madrid, judging from the numbers which appear in their inventories. Like many of his peers, Soria Arteaga was also an admirer of Juan de la Corte's paintings with small figures in extensive architectural settings, and the fact that he owned 11 of these works (nos. 1, 22, 23, 37) suggests that he was one of the artist's staunchest admirers. The attribution added to no. 1 in brackets comes from the inventory.

The collection of Soria Arteaga was more unusual for the owner's remarkable enthusiasm for still-life paintings, which made up one-third of the collection. In this respect, it is comparable to only one other collection published to date, that of the gentleman Don Francisco Merchant de la Cerda inventoried in 1662.<sup>5</sup> Perhaps Soria Arteaga's taste for still life induced him to have the collection valued by Francisco de Burgos Mantilla, a pupil of Velázquez who painted still life and one of whose paintings he also owned (no. 44). Juan van der Hamen was the best represented still-life painter in the collection. By Soria Arteaga's marriage, he already owned 23 still lifes, 17 of which were by Van der Hamen, and he boasted 21 of his paintings in 1644 (nos. 25, 72, and 73, coincidentally, Merchant de la Cerda owned the same number of Van der Hamens in 1662).

Merchant de la Cerda hung still-life paintings throughout his house and was particularly keen on the work of Juan de Espinosa, by whom he owned eight still lifes, a flowerpiece, and six bodegones. Soria Arteaga's collection contained only a pair of small still lifes by Espinosa (no. 26); he seems to have been far more interested in the work of Juan Fernández El Labrador, by whom he owned five still-life paintings (nos. 9, 10, and 33). Three of these were described as representing grapes, the subject matter at which the artist excelled and which was most sought after by collectors. In the inventory of the goods Soria Arteaga brought to his marriage, it was noted that, after the union, he exchanged a figure painting of the Conversion of Mary Magdalene for two still lifes of grapes, one by El Labrador and the other by Pietro Paolo Bonzi, whom he called by his nickname, "the hunchback of Naples" (no. 11).<sup>6</sup> It is worth noting that Burgos Mantilla appears to have thought more highly of the Labrador (no. 10), valuing this at seven times more than the Bonzi painting in the appraisal. Although Soria Arteaga does not mention the individual with whom he made the exchange, an ideal candidate could have been Giovanni Battista Crescenzi (d. 1635). Crescenzi, the Roman nobleman, architect, and amateur artist, was at the Spanish court since 1617, where he enjoyed a high reputation as a connoisseur of painting with a long-standing interest in still life painting, which he also practiced. He encouraged the painting of such pictures in his Roman "academy," which included the young Pietro Paolo Bonzi, and promoted El Labrador among collectors at the Spanish court.<sup>7</sup> Soria Arteaga's acquisition of grape still lifes of Bonzi and Labrador can be interpreted as further circumstantial evidence linking the Spanish artist to sources in the Roman Caravaggesque milieu, from where his style has long thought to have derived.

Soria Arteaga owned four still lifes by Antonio Ponce (nos. 32), a pupil of Van der Hamen, which may have been acquired directly from the artist, who lived on the same street as the contador at this date.<sup>8</sup> Two still lifes attributed to one "Rumolu" (no. 74), as well as sixteen landscape paintings listed by the same painter (no. 75), had been acquired before Soria Arteaga's marriage. This artist must have been Francisco de Rómulo Cincinnato, an artist who "inherited" the knighthood of the Order of Christ conferred on his better-known older brother, Diego de Rómulo.<sup>9</sup> The work of neither artist is known today.

Among the pieces of wood sculpture listed at the end of Burgos Mantilla's appraisal, but not included in the transcription here, were two images of the child Jesus by the contemporary sculptor Juan de Bejerano. The identity of another master, called "the mulato" (no. 84), remains mysterious. Two scenes of the Nativity of Christ and the Flight into Egypt made with small wax figures by one Jorge Salvador (no. 89) were also valued by the painter-appraiser and testify to the taste for such objects among the most discerning of connoisseurs of the time.

The postmortem inventory of the estate of Jusepe Gómez de Arratia, a member of the household of the Cardinal Infante Don Ferdinand, and of his wife Antonia Méndez, was drawn up in Madrid from 25 May 1645, and the collection of paintings was appraised on 30 June 1645, by the painter Domingo de Carrión (ff. 855–857v). This collector had a taste for small paintings on metal and panel; the first 25 pictures listed were such works (nos. 1–19), 12 of which were of the same size and framed in the same manner with ebony and pearwood. Not all of these were of religious subjects, however; Gómez de Arratia shared a courtly taste for mythological subjects, which included the stories of Diana (nos. 4, 5), Venus (no. 32), Bacchus (no. 13), and Argos (no. 25). His paintings of the heads of Romulus and Remus (nos. 14) and of Roman Charity (no. 21) suggest that his taste did not simply imitate that of his social superiors, but that this was an educated collector with classical interests. He owned two portraits of his patron, the Infante-Cardinal Don Ferdinand (nos. 23, 39) and a number of genre subjects, which may have been Flemish (nos. 33, 36, 37), but the only attributed work in the document was a copy after Bassano of an unspecified subject.

Cardenal Gaspar de Borja y Velasco, Arzobispo de Toledo

Don Gaspar de Borja y de Velasco (1582–1645) was born into one of the great noble houses of Spain, being the son of Francisco Tomás de Borja y Centellas, 6th Duque de Gandía, 1st Conde de Valencia, and Juana de Velasco y de Aragón, daughter of Iñigo Fernández de Velasco, 5th Condestable de Castilla.<sup>1</sup> He pursued a distinguished career in the church, which took him from a canonry of the cathedral of Cuenca to the archbishopric of Seville (1632–1643). In Italy, he was Archbishop of Milan, a cardinal at the papal court in Rome – where he was a protector of Giovanni Baglione<sup>2</sup> – and extraordinary ambassador of Philip III in Rome in 1616, as well as interim Viceroy of Naples in 1620; by the time of his death on 28 December 1645 he had risen to one of the highest ecclesiastical offices in Spain as Archbishop of Toledo.

The detailed inventory of Cardinal Borja's picture collection was drawn up in Madrid by his brother Don Melchor Zentellan de Borja on 22 January 1646. In the document, measurements are given in palmi (probably the Roman palmus of 22.5 cm.), which suggests that it follows an earlier list of his paintings drawn up during his residence in Rome. It is likely too that the majority of his pictures were acquired in Italy. The collection was almost entirely made up of religious subjects, as was appropriate for one of Spain's most pious and prominent princes of the church. In the accounts of the Duque de Pastrana's embassy to Rome between 1623 and 1626, one large Nativity of Christ was listed as having been given to him by Cardinal Borja.<sup>3</sup> Many of Borja's devotional images were painted on copper, as was a St. Francis by Giuseppe Cesari (no. 69), one of the few named artists in the inventory. Some items were covered with curtains.

The profane genres were represented by a large number of landscape paintings, many of which formed sets and were painted on copper, as well as fruit still lifes and flowerpieces. The collection also included allegorical series of the Elements, Seasons, Parts of the World, and the Virtues. Cardinal Borja's portrait collection comprised one group representing members of his family, which included a portrait of Borja himself (nos. 161, 176). Toward the end of the inventory there was a full-length portrait of Philip IV (no. 314), described as "old," perhaps denoting that it was a version of Velázquez's two prototypes dating from the 1620s. A hunting portrait of Prince Baltasar Carlos (no. 299) was almost certainly a version of Velázquez's portrait of Prince Baltasar Carlos in Hunting Costume (Madrid, Prado) painted for the Torre de la Parada. There were two portraits of the Conde-Duque de Olivares (nos. 297, 298), one full-length and the other half-length. The life-sized portrait of Cardinal Borja himself seated in a chair (no. 296) must record Velázquez's lost portrait, painted in 1645. It lends support to the belief that Velázquez's original represented the sitter full-length, seated in a chair, as shown in a copy (78.7 x 53.4 cm.) that was in the Flatter Collection (London). Although the portrait itself is lost, a magnificent preparatory chalk drawing by Velázquez is in the collection of the Real Academia de Bellas Artes de San Fernando.

As has already been discussed in the Introduction and in the notes to Document 18, the collection of the 9th Almirante de Castilla caught the particular attention of contemporaries. We should especially recall the group of pictures given by the almirante to Philip IV for the Escorial, the frames for which are noted in the present document with prices varying from 200 to 3,000 reales per frame (as much as was given to a large multi-figured composition). This is of interest not only for its documentation of the relationship with the royal collection but also, as we have noted, because the prices can be used as an internal benchmark to measure the values set on pictures. These suggest that the evaluator, Arias, had doubts about the authorship of works attributed to Bellini at only 350 reales, to Titian at 250, to Leonardo da Vinci at 250, or a number of portraits attributed to Titian at 80–132 reales. This is made explicit at lot number 92: “a small picture of St. Roch, which they say is by the hand of Titian but is not ... 50 reales.”

Among the visitors to the Almirante's collection was Graf Ferdinand Harrach, Imperial Ambassador to Madrid. Ambassador Harrach's account, dated in Madrid 16 May 1674, is of interest not only for the light it throws upon the gallery but also for the way in which it illustrates the acquisitive culture of the age, including tidbits on the Carpio and other collections.<sup>1</sup>

Vormittag bin ich zu Haus geblieben, nachmittag in des Almirante Garten gangen un sein Gemähl gesehen, welche gar schön seind von denen besten Meistern und in grosser Menge, also dass mich geduncket, des Kaisers Galeria von dem Erzherzog Leopold gleiche disen nit in der Menge der gueten Bilder. Was ich gar absonderlich beobachtet ist, dass er ein Stuck von MICHAEL ANGELO BUONAROTA hat, welches er sehr estimirt, indeme dieser Mahler das meiste nur al fresco auf die Mauer gemahlt; einen gar kleines contrafait eines Cardinal von Titian, auf welche Weis er nit pfelegt zu mahlen. Sonsten hat er die Zimmer gar wol abgetheilet, eines mit lauter Stuken von Titian, ein anderes von Tintoret, eines von Van Dyck, eines von Rubens (in welchem zwei Baurenstuk mit Landschaft und kleinen Figuren, so gar galant), ein anders Spagnolet, so sie hier Don Joseph de Ribera nennen, eines von Bassan, ein Kabinet von lauter kleinen Stucken von Breugl, dann andere Zimmer von unterschiedlichen, al Raphael, Paul Veronese, Palma, und leztlich ein Zimmer von lauter Gemahl unterschiedlichen spanischen Mahlern, al Mudo, Velasco, Careña [sic] und dergleichen. Die Ramen von denen Bildern seind unterschiedlich, theils schwarz mit einer vergulden Leisten, theils ganz verguldt. Das Gebäu des Hauses is sonst schlecht und irregulier, und siht man, dass ein Stokel an das andere geflickt worden, inwendig aber mit unterschiedlichen alcoven und Berschlag von Spiegelgläsern gar sauber geziert.... [He mentions a garden with two water-play fountains.] ... Die ganz läng des Garten lasst er Schupfen oder Gewölber machen in Form einer Galeria, auf selben eine Terasse mit seinen Palustren und Statuen....[a hermitage chapel] ... Der Garten und Haus ligt al Prado jejo.

Harrach also mentions (p. 51) the Equestrian Statue of Philip III (by Tacca) on the grounds of the Casa del Campo, as well as a visit to the gallery of the Duque del Infantado (p. 87), of which he gives no details. On May 30 1674, the Duque del Infantado sponsored a gala in honor of the feast of San Fernando (p. 95). Harrach also cites the works by Titian in the royal collection (p. 87), along with tapestries and statues, some of the latter being copies after ancient works in Rome.

Habe ich dar [i.e., in the Royal Palace, probably the Alcázar] ein Invention gesehen, welche sie sagen, seie von dem verstorbenen König gewest. Da, wo die Correspondenz eines Gemahl gegen den anderen wegen Mangel des Orts nit hat sein können, hat er ein guetes Gemahl halben Theil copiren un die [R?]am auch halben Theil sezen lassen bis an die Mauer und damit zu verstehen geben wollen, der andere halbe Theil seie hinter der Mauer.

He is shown around the palace by Carreño. He then (p. 88) visits some royal house “in die Florida,” where there is a garden and works by Van Dyck and Rubens (i.e., the Torre de la Parada?) (p. 71 – 4 March 1674):

Nachmittag bin ich spazieren gefahren und habe meine Karl mitgenommen. Habe ein kleines Häusel, so der Ms. de Liche ein halbe Stund von hier hat, gesehen, so gar herzlich ist. Das Gebau ist inwendig al fresco gemahlen, die Böden hat ein Walscher D. Dionisio N. gemahlen, so mich aber nit absonderlich guet geduncket. Un denen Mauern herumb seind von unterschiedlichen Meistern gemahlet als Carafa und andern, so sich hier befundten. Er hat ein huerta darbei mit unterschiedlichen Obstbaumen. (p. 96 – 1 June 1674) Nachmittag bin ich incognito zu dem venedischen Botschafter, von ihme in des M. de Liche Almoneda, alwo aber fast nicht als Bilder zu verkaufen waren, und die meisten nur Copeien, doch von gueten Originalen. (pp. 86–87 – 30 April 1674) Nach selber bin ich an ein Orth gefahren, gwise Gemahl zu sehen, unter denen von Carracha, Rubens, Mario de Flores un dergleichen waren, so ich aber nit kaufen wollen weilien sie teuer und ich nicht versichert, dass es Originalien seien.

A word might also be appended about the documents recording this collection. The inventory originally came to light because of a copy made ca. 1702 by notaries working to sequester the 11th almirante's estate after he had fled to Portugal during the events surrounding the War of the Spanish Succession. Subsequently, the original notarial documents of 1647 were located as follows:

(a) [Original document – inventory] Madrid: AHPM, Prot. 6.314 (notary Francisco Suárez y Rivera, 1647 and misc.), ff. 1028–1090; dated in Madrid, 7 February – 19 June 1647;

(b) [Original document – valuation] AHPM, Prot. 6.233 (notary Francisco Suárez y Rivera, 1647 III), ff. 258–452; dated in Madrid 25 June 1647 and subsequent, described as follows: “Tasación de los bienes que quedaron por muerte del exmo. Sr. don Juan Alfonso Enriquez de Cabrera [9th] Almirante de Castilla”;

(c) [Copy – valuation] Madrid: Archivo Histórico Nacional (AHN), Sección confiscos y secuestros, legajo 4, pza. 3a.<sup>2</sup>

The paintings were appraised 7 August 1647 by Antonio Arias, painter, and appear on ff. 326–362 of the inventory. The paintings were assigned general inventory numbers from 243 to 1626 with many numbers omitted and some lots containing more than one picture; numbers in the inventory correspond to those in the valuation. There were also important tapestries (ff. 261–64), a large library (ff. 380–418), many statues and objets d'art, and a collection of picture frames (ff. 445–448) with useful valuations giving an idea of the worth of various types of frames.

For the inventory of his widow, see Document 74.

2. The AHN copy published by Fernández Duro in 1903 agrees with the original in the AHPM with only minor variations. Fernández Duro's no. 451 is specified in the 1647 document, no. 704, as being 12 maps from Italy ("cartas Grandes de cosmografía que an Venido de italia"). A handful of unimportant pieces were omitted from the copy, but have been restored here from the original.
3. See Pérez Sánchez, "Ribera and Spain: His Spanish Patrons in Italy and Spain; The Influence of His Work on Spanish Artists," Ribera, Exh. cat., The Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1992, p. 39. Ribera's Hecate (Fig. 33) now at Apsley House, London, was one of several Riberas donated to San Pascual, a convent and church founded by the 9th Almirante de Castilla's son Juan Gaspar. For a description of the works in San Pascual, see Ponz, Viaje de España (1772-1794), ed. M. Aguilar, Madrid 1947, pp. 421-423. This picture seems to be in Juan Gaspar's 1691 inventory as well (Doc. 117, no. 169), but without an attribution.
4. Dürer's Adam (Fig. 34) and Eve (Fig. 35), Prado (Nos. 2.177 and 2.178).
5. According to Keith Christianson in Ribera, Exh. cat., The Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1992, p. 151, Ribera's Saint Sebastian has sometimes been identified with a picture destroyed during World War II that was in the Kaiser Friedrich Museum in Berlin.
6. This is very likely Antonio de Pereda's Allegory of Vanity (Fig. 36) in the Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna (771). It definitely appears in the 10th Almirante de Castilla's inventory of 1691 (Doc. 117, no. 95). See Jordan's Spanish Still Life in the Golden Age 1600-1650 1985, p. 214, where this item is cited from Fernández Duro, 1903, and the artist mistranscribed as "el Esparido".
7. Guercino's Jacob Blessing the Sons of Joseph (Fig. 37) was donated to San Pascual in Madrid by the 9th Almirante's son, Juan Gaspar. Brought to England by Godoy ca. 1803, this picture is now in the collection of Denis Mahon, London. Mahon's painting by Guercino of Saint Gregory the Great with Saint Ignatius and Saint Francisco Javier (Fig. 38) was also from the 9th and 10th Almirantes de Castilla's collection as well as in San Pascual, and has been identified as no. 394 of this document. Neither work is identifiable in the 10th Almirante de Castilla's inventory published here (Doc. 117).

10. See no. 386 of this document, and its footnote.
11. This picture has been identified as Ribera's Immaculate Conception (Fig. 41) in the Prado (1.070) by Pérez Sánchez and Spínosa, L'opera completa del Ribera, 1978, no. 202, p. 124. See also Ribera, Exh. cat., The Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1992, p. 39 and p. 121.

The inventory of Don Martín Real (d. 14 October 1647), a member of the Supremo Consejo de la Inquisición, was drawn up by the executors of his testament, the Conde de la Puebla de Montalvan, Doctor Don Pedro Pacheco, both members of the Consejos de la General Inquisición and the Consejo Real de Castilla, and Fray Francisco Real, Abbot of the convent of San Norberto of Madrid, in Madrid beginning on the same day.

Real was a bibliophile, owning a large library of books and a small picture collection, which were appraised by the painter Juan Bautista de la Cotera on 15 October 1647. Not surprisingly for a prominent member of the Consejo de la Inquisición, Real's figurative pictures were mostly of religious subjects. He did, however, own an example of the popular classical subject of the Burning of Troy (no. 16) and, more interestingly, a painting of Seneca (no. 3). While this latter painting perhaps reflected an educated interest in classical stoicism, paintings of philosophers were generally popular by this date through copies after the works of Jusepe de Ribera. Seneca was especially admired for being austere and beyond reproach, and therefore an exemplary type for officials and ministers.

Catalina Fernández de Córdoba y Aragón, Condesa-Duquesa de Olivares, Condesa de Morente and Marquesa del Carpio

Luis Méndez de Haro y Guzmán was born in Valladolid in 1598, the son of Diego López de Haro, the fifth Marqués del Carpio, and of Francisca de Guzmán, Olivares' elder sister.<sup>1</sup> He served in the retinue of his uncle at court, learning the statecraft that he would put to use after Olivares' fall from power in the 1640s. Don Luis married Catalina Fernández de Cardona Cordova y Aragón, a daughter of the Duque de Segorbe, on 28 October 1624, having signed capitulaciones matrimoniales at San Lorenzo el Real (that is, El Escorial) and Madrid, 19--20 October 1624.<sup>2</sup> Through his mother, Don Luis inherited the title of Marqués de Eliche, which had belonged to Olivares, although he seems to have passed this title directly to his son, Don Gaspar, who is so styled in the inventory of 1648. Don Luis eventually inherited the titles of Conde de Olivares and Duque de Sanlúcar el Mayor as well.<sup>3</sup> On the death of his father in 1648, Don Luis became the 6th Marqués del Carpio and 2nd Conde de Morente. He was created Duque de Montoro in 1660.<sup>4</sup>

Don Luis succeeded his uncle, Olivares, as the válido of Philip IV.<sup>5</sup> The Spanish Empire, which had been on the verge of disintegration at the time of Olivares' fall, was restored to at least a superficial harmony during Don Luis's term of office, and he is credited with negotiating the peace treaty with France in 1660. The king's favor led to many lucrative court offices and other appointments, but Don Luis is said to have been particularly honest. In spite of many opportunities to enrich himself at the expense of the crown, he left massive debts upon his death in 1661.<sup>6</sup>

Although the art collections of the Carpio family have often been studied, most of the attention has focused on the holdings of Don Luis's son, Gaspar de Haro y Guzmán, whose many adventures made him famous in his own time (see essay of Doc. 49). If, however, the father's life cannot rival the flamboyance of the son's, the elder Carpio can claim, in addition to his political accomplishments, some merit as a collector. Indeed, his acquisitions attracted the attention of contemporaries as early as 1638.<sup>7</sup> Don Luis must be considered one of the most important collectors of his era, with works by the Bassani, Palma Vecchio, Schiavone, Titian, Tintoretto, Veronese, Barocci, Correggio, Gentileschi, Parmigianino, Perugino, Andrea del Sarto, Reni, and possibly Raphael and Procaccini among the Italians, as well as (by 1661) Rubens, Van Dyck, Holbein, Stanzione, Paul de Vos, and Dürer among the northerners. Among his few Spanish pieces, he may also have owned works by Bocanegra, Orrente, and possibly Murillo.

The first complete record we have of the Haro family collection is the present document: an inventory taken upon the death of Don Luis's wife, Doña Catalina, in 1648 (the inventory records their joint estate). Doña Catalina had brought a dowry of 100,000 ducats to her marriage to Don Luis in 1624, and at her death her personal worth accounted for nearly half the family fortune. Her dowry, however, included no paintings of value, and since Don Luis did not come into the estates of Carpio and Morente until 1648, we may assume that the 1648 inventory documents their collecting activities from 1624 to 1648, along with his acquisitions before their marriage.

Very few paintings – about one in eight – are attributed in the 1648 inventory. This may be explained in part by the uncontested nature of Doña Catalina's estate: no public auction was anticipated, and there was consequently little motive to establish the "official" authorship of each work. Even so, the lack of attributions offers a contrast to her son Don Gaspar's near-obsession with precise connoisseurship. Nor was the paucity of attributions merely the result of low values, since the unattributed entries accounted for four of the most expensive works in the collection (nos. 129, 133, 217, and 225).

Fortunately, we can augment the scarce information found in the 1648 inventory. A comparison with subsequent accounts of the Carpio holdings adds several names to the list.<sup>8</sup> For example, the Equestrian Portrait of the Marqués de Aytona, no. 102 in 1648, may be identified with a work attributed to Van Dyck in the 1651 and 1689 inventories of Don Gaspar de Haro (Doc. 49, no. 177 and Doc. 115, no. 235). The Christ Washing the Disciples' Feet, no. 133 in 1648, is almost certainly the canvas of the same subject by Tintoretto, no. 11 in 1689.<sup>9</sup> No. 124, Balthasar Carlos in the Riding School, is by Velázquez.

The 1648 collection was typical among Spanish collections of the age. Over three-fifths of the works were religious, and most of the secular pieces were either portraits or the Flemish landscapes that were common in seventeenth-century Spain. The Venetian emphasis, the focus on late sixteenth-century works, and the presence of Sánchez Coello and Ribera were likewise common elements in aristocratic collections.

At the same time, the 1648 Carpio collection displays a remarkable bias toward Italian art. If we subtract large landscapes, still lifes, and other decorative pieces from the number of Flemish entries, we are left with only two Van Dycks, two Brueghels (themselves landscapes), and a few portraits. Of course, any argument from negative evidence is tenuous; we cannot be sure that unattributed works were not Flemish as well. But if we take only those attributed paintings that a connoisseur might value for reasons beyond purely decorative function, we find (as noted in the Introduction) that nearly three-quarters are Italian, and that most of the Spanish and Flemish artists named had strong ties to Italy: Navarrete, Velázquez, and Ribera, as well as Van Dyck (no works were given to Rubens).

Before presenting the data for the 1648 inventory, however, one must pause to consider at some length other documentation for Don Luis's collecting activities.

Alonso de Cárdenas has already been mentioned with regard to Don Luis's gifts to Philip IV and those for the Escorial, and with regard to the Viceroyalty of the Duque de Alcalá in Naples. His correspondence with Don Luis, preserved in the Palacio de Liria and other archives,<sup>10</sup> throws considerable light on Don Luis's acquisitions and attitudes as a collector. As Don Luis's letters imply, Cárdenas was in London from about 1638 and served as the Spanish Ambassador to Cromwell's England from about 1650 until the outbreak of war between England and Spain in 1655 made his removal to Flanders necessary.<sup>11</sup> He also served as Don Luis's personal agent in purchasing works of art from the Pembroke, Arundel, royal, and other collections. The letters in the Palacio de Liria that document Cárdenas' activities include descriptions of objects, accounts of monies spent on works of art, reports on problems of crating and shipping, and much other information.<sup>12</sup> Don Luis's replies are also preserved, but the disastrous fire that destroyed many of the Alba family's archives and library late in the eighteenth century badly damaged this part of the correspondence. The remaining fragments were published by the Duquesa de Berwick y Alba in 1891.<sup>13</sup>

In spite of the relatively slow pace of communication in the seventeenth century and the concomitant necessity of allowing Cárdenas to exercise his own judgment, Don Luis was able to keep in close touch with Cárdenas' activities. He applauded Cárdenas when the ambassador had done well and informed Cárdenas of his plans for the pictures, once they had arrived in Madrid:

And I assure your Honor that all of them, as regards the quality of their [authorship], have seemed to me to be very good, and at very accommodating prices, particularly the ... pictures by Raphael ... The Mercury by Correggio, and the Lavatorio by Tintoretto, which I judge to be very great things, of high esteem, and which will, I believe, give much pleasure to the King and particularly to me in being able to give them to him, because in spite of their being things of such small importance, yet he has a very particular inclination to painting ...<sup>14</sup>

Don Luis also specified subjects and masters. He assured Cárdenas at one point that there was no need, "Thank God," for any more merely devotional works,<sup>15</sup> although he later urged the ambassador to be on the watch for devotional pictures by Rubens and Van Dyck that could serve to "illustrate" the life of St. Lawrence.<sup>16</sup> (Presumably both comments were related to the re-decoration campaigns at the Escorial, as discussed below.) He even specified approximate sizes.<sup>17</sup> Don Luis followed with interest Cárdenas' efforts to buy a Holy Family by Raphael from a member of Parliament, who had taken it out of the sale of Charles I's estate.<sup>18</sup> Finally, as we have seen, Don Luis kept Cárdenas informed of the fate of each purchase at the hands of connoisseurs – particularly Velázquez and Nardi – at court. For example, to the correspondence we have already cited, we may add the following comment:

... And when the King returns to San Lorenzo [i.e., the Escorial], I will have the large Madonna by Raphael in place in his quarters, with which I believe he will have to be greatly pleased. Velázquez has already seen it, and it seemed a very great thing to him, as I hope will be the case with all the rest. Thank God ... [undated; probably 1654].<sup>19</sup>

Unfortunately, not all of Don Luis's purchases met such acclaim; see the discussion in the Introduction.

As we have seen, Don Luis was also aware of what other nobles were doing, particularly in the case of the Conde de Fuensaldaña. The haste with which Fuensaldaña's agent, the artist David Teniers the Younger, went about his activities – for example, leaving works with Cárdenas for shipment to Spain – gave Don Luis an opportunity to look over Fuensaldaña's purchases. A number of the Fuensaldaña works had also been sought by Don Luis; twenty-one of them would eventually enter the Carpio collection. These included a Bassano Nativity and an Annunciation to the Shepherds, a Palma Vecchio Holy Family, Titian's Adoration of the Magi (possibly now in the Prado), a portrait and a Madonna by Andrea del Sarto, six portraits by Tintoretto, two works by Van Dyck, and four by Veronese, possibly including the Kneeling Magdalene and the Susannah and Elders now in the Prado.

The Cárdenas correspondence also gives us occasional glimpses of Don Luis's personal life in the 1650s. The most important event to which the documents refer is the fire that, in December 1654, badly damaged Don Luis's recently obtained palace at Santa Maria in Madrid. According to contemporary accounts, the palace and its contents suffered considerably.<sup>20</sup> Don Luis, however, tells Cárdenas that the damage was principally in the roof and that the subsequent construction was in keeping with Don Luis's already developed plans to enlarge his new home. In February of 1655, Don Luis again assures Cárdenas about the fire:

... With regard to the fire at my posada ... nothing was lost ... neither of any value, nor any jewel, [nor tapestry], not even a single painting; and although some of the larger [paintings] suffered a little in being taken off the walls and out of the house, the damage touched no faces<sup>21</sup>

There follow comments on his family and his hope that his children will soon be able to reunite in his house to help him entertain the king and queen.

The inventory taken upon Don Luis's death in 1661 has survived only in a fragmentary and highly suspect form in documents of the early nineteenth century, conserved in the Alba Archives at the Palacio de Liria, Madrid.<sup>22</sup> The documents are three lists, each of which pretends to copy older information; all three were made up at the time of a lawsuit between the Duke of Berwick and the heirs of the 17th Duquesa de Alba, the famous "Doña Cayetana."

When Doña Cayetana died without issue in 1802, her titles passed to Berwick, who was her cousin as well as a member of the pretendent branch of the English royal family. A court battle ensued as the Duke of Berwick (now Duque de Berwick y Alba) attempted to obtain as much of Doña Cayetana's material estate as possible. Obviously, the lands, rents, castles, and other possessions pertaining to the houses of Alba, Liria, Huéscar, Carpio, Olivares, Monterrey, etc., all belonged to Berwick. But Doña Cayetana had also owned valuable property – including the picture collection – in her own right. This property could be willed to her legal heirs without regard to the succession of the family titles.

Don Luis de Haro, in his will of 1658, attempted to integrate parts of his picture collection into the mayorazgo, or primogeniture of the House of Carpio.<sup>23</sup> The paintings so reserved (pinturas vinculadas) thereafter became a part of the family title, like the land from which the title derived its name. By 1802, however, the memorial that Don Luis had prepared to specify which paintings were to be integrated into the estate seems to have been lost. The surviving documents in the Alba Archives formed part of the attempt by Berwick's lawyers to lay claim to any pictures in the Alba-Carpio art collection that Don Luis might have specified. Supporting documents – originally in the AHPM – are now missing. Indeed, the notarial archives supposedly covering this period are fragmentary.<sup>24</sup> The years 1802–04 were a time of confusion in Spanish government. Might someone in power – someone with an interest in collecting pictures – have been able to remove documents from the protocols in order that the Carpio pictures might be pried free of the mayorazgo? A number of candidates for such an intervention exist, foremost among whom is Manuel Godoy, the Prime Minister and eventual owner of several of the Carpio pictures.

Two of the “inventories” are obviously spurious, but one of them (located in caja 161–48) appears to be a fairly accurate reflection of Don Luis’s collection, since almost all the pictures may be traced to the 1689 inventory (Doc. 115) of Don Luis’s son, Don Gaspar, and many of them are the same works mentioned in the Carpio-Cárdenas correspondence. Although we cannot be sure that some of Don Gaspar’s acquisitions have not crept into the list, the inventory nevertheless gives us a field within which to locate Don Luis’s efforts.

Among the papers of the Carpio estates in the Alba archives is another list of pictures. These were inventoried in several rooms of an unspecified palace: the rooms are the bedroom (dormitorio), large office (apostento grande), library (librería), and something called the “garden” (jardín), which probably meant a garden pavilion, perhaps the same jardín that Don Gaspar de Haro enlarged near the San Joaquín gate at the site of the present Palacio de Liria. The document itself is in a late seventeenth-century hand on typical seventeenth-century paper, but there is no contemporary label or context to indicate whether it relates to the estate of Don Luis de Haro or that of his son, Don Gaspar. (The notes on a number of the pictures indicating the origins of the works – “England,” “the Almirante,” “Monterrey” – may eventually yield a terminus post quem.) As indicated in the Introduction, the works on the list are principally by renowned masters of the Italian Renaissance, plus a suite of three works by Guido Reni. Could this list be Don Luis’s accounting of entailed pictures? Even if the list dates from the time of Don Luis’s son, Don Gaspar de Haro, enough of the works on it can be related to Don Luis’s collecting activities to allow us to use it as a summary of the best in his collection.

Because the Cárdenas correspondence is incomplete, and the two inventories just discussed are not firmly datable – that is, because they cannot be considered reliable contemporary descriptions of Don Luis’s collections – they have not been transcribed here.

Doña Catalina Fernández de Cardona Córdoba y Aragón, wife of Don Luis Méndez de Haro, died 19 November 1648. The paintings were appraised by Francisco Barrera on 19 May 1648.<sup>25</sup>

1. Eight members of the Haro family held the title of Marqués del Carpio from its inception in 1552 until its merger into the House of Alba in 1733. Haro family history is complex, involving several female heirs and a series of intermarriages with the Houses of Monterrey (Azevedo) and Olivares (Guzmán). See Paz y Espeso 1948, passim, and García Carraffa, vol. 42, 1954, pp. 293–95 and 190ff. Paz y Espeso 1948 gives 1576 as the date of Don Luis's grandparents' wedding. His mother died in 1642, his father in 1648. Note that, possibly owing to a typographical error, Paz y Espeso gives Don Luis's birthdate as 1590 instead of 1598. Cf. García Carraffa, vol. 42, 1954, p. 295.

3. The extensive lawsuits over the Conde-Duque's estate are documented in Marañon 1965, pp. 477ff. The lawsuit is mentioned in Don Luis's will (AHPM, Prot. 6.292, ff. 447f).

According to the information provided by Tomás

- Valiente, the Spanish term for “favorite” was privado in the first half of the seventeenth century but was replaced by válido sometime around the end of Philip IV’s reign. Casal 1930 provides a brief overview of Don Luis’s collecting.
6. See AHPM, Prot. 6.292, ff. 460-472. A good example of the honest reputation which has adhered to Don Luis’s name may be found in the Enciclopedia Universal Ilustrada, vol. 27, 1958 (ca. 1925), p. 587. The article (inaccurate in various details) notes that Haro stimulated agriculture, arts, and letters, and asserts that he “never used his privanza with the king for personal ends.”

11. Cárdenas’ career is outlined by Álvarez y Baena 1789/1973, vol. 1, p. 53. His arrival and early activities in England are noted in S.R. Gardiner, History of England, New York 1901, vol. 8, pp. 377–387, and vol. 9, pp. 58–69. His appointment to England is announced in a draft despatch from Philip IV, dated 7 March 1638 (Simancas: Archivo Histórico Nacional, Sección Estado, legajo 2575). He had arrived in England by 16 May 1638 (legajo 2521). I am indebted to Prof. John Elliott for these references. Barrionuevo, vol. 1, 1892, p. 232 (Letter 115, 8 December 1655), reports that Cárdenas has been put under house arrest by Cromwell; on 8 January 1656 (Letter 123, p. 236), Barrionuevo asserts, “ya esta en Flandes don Alonso de Cárdenas, embajador de Inglaterra, esperando orden de lo que ha de hacer.”

Barrionuevo reports rumors that the damage approached 100,000 ducats. In Letter 34, p. 159 (5 December 1654), Don Luis is said to have paid out 12,000 ducats to initiate repairs. 1648

The postmortem inventory of Don Garçi Galló de Escalada Olaso y Manrique, knight of the Order of Santiago and Secretary of the Cámara de Castilla, was drawn up by his widow Mariana de Ribera y Vargas, and begun in Madrid on 26 September 1648. The paintings collection was appraised by the painter and member of the Flemish royal guard of archeros, Felipe Diriksen, on 28 October 1648 (ff. 283v–285v). The picture collection had barely altered from the time his paintings were listed in an inventory of capital drawn up on the occasion of his marriage in 1624.<sup>1</sup>

Galló de Escalada's paintings included portraits of the royal family (nos. 1–3, 13) which were a prerequisite of the collections of members of the royal administration. He is recorded owing the painter Andrés Ruiz 36 ducats for three unspecified portraits in the artist's testament of 1622.<sup>2</sup> Interestingly, the most highly valued of these was a full-length of Philip III (no. 1), during whose reign this collector may have risen to prominence at court. In the inventory of 1624, this was said to depict the king in the costume in which the Portuguese Cortes swore allegiance to him on his visit to Lisbon in 1619.<sup>3</sup> This portrait, therefore, was probably a version of a portrait of the king by Bartolomé González that hung in the Alcázar's New Room.<sup>4</sup> The only religious paintings were attributed to Pedro de Orrente (no. 5) and a copy after Titian (no. 30). A series of four paintings of the Seasons were said to be copies after Orrente (no. 24). Galló de Escalada clearly enjoyed the paintings of Juan van der Hamen, by whom he owned eleven fruit still lifes (no. 4), also listed in the inventory of 1624, and two flowerpieces (no. 22). In addition there were nine other flowerpieces (nos. 8 and 17), 16 flowerpieces painted on "lozenges" (no. 10), and six still lifes (no. 12). Although all of these latter paintings were listed anonymously, in the inventory of 1624 the "lozenge"-shaped flowerpieces were said to be Flemish, as were five fruit still lifes. A less innocuous painting was the single mythological subject in the collection, a painting of Venus (no. 7) which undoubtedly represented a nude female figure. The attribution to Orrente in no. 5 comes from the inventory.

The combined inventory and valuation of the estate of Antonio González Cárdena (d. 5 January 1651) was drawn up by his widow Margarita de Rebenga y Proaño, beginning in Madrid on 5 January 1651. Paintings were appraised on 4 February 1651, by the painter Antonio Arias.

An unusual aspect of González Cárdena's collection is the comparatively small number of conventional religious subjects represented. There were paintings of the martyrdoms of St. Bartholomew (no. 1) and St. Lawrence (no. 27), Eden (no. 4), landscapes with the Apostles (no. 21), the Nativity (no. 24), and four landscapes with the story of the Old Testament hero Samson (no. 28). The figurative subject matter of 12 perspectival paintings is unspecified (nos. 18, 19).

Paintings of Europa (no. 25) and another of a nude woman with a young man playing an organ (also included in item no. 25) may have been copies of paintings by Titian in the Spanish royal collection. The influence of the Spanish royal collection could also be reflected in González Cárdena's painting of Queen Tomyris with the Head of Ciro (no. 6), since a Flemish painting of this subject had hung in the Hall of Mirrors of the Madrid Alcázar in the 1620s (Madrid, Prado).<sup>1</sup> The same subject is found again in the collection of Diego de Cortavila y Sanabria (Doc. 77, no. 14) as well as Miguel de Salamanca where it is called a copy after Rubens (Doc. 63, no. 9) and inventoried with four other Rubens' copies.

There was a painting of sea gods (no. 5) and another of Nautilus (no. 8). The classical flavor of the collection was continued in two paintings that appear to have represented scenes from the life of Helen of Troy (no. 5). The large painting of the classical subject of gladiators (no. 2) brings to mind scenes of life in ancient Rome that decorated the royal palace of the Buen Retiro, at least one of which, by Giovanni Lanfranco, represented a Banquet with Gladiators (Madrid, Prado). An unusual painting of the Coronation of Charles V (no. 5) perhaps reflects pride in the Spanish imperial past.

González Cárdena also owned a copy of a large bodegón by Frans Snyders (no. 3). Originals by this artist were sought after by the wealthiest of aristocratic collectors and may have been beyond his means. Two hunting scenes in the collection (nos. 7, 23) may also have been copies after Flemish prototypes, and would appear to reflect this collector's imitation of the taste of his noble contemporaries. There were also four modest fruit still lifes (no. 10), ten flowerpieces (nos. 12 and 22), and four still lifes with birds, sweets, fruit, and vessels (nos. 13 and 14) whose descriptions strongly suggest that they were painted by Spanish artists active at court at this time, such as Juan de Espinosa or Antonio Ponce.

The postmortem inventory of Don Francisco de Prado Bravo de Mendoza, a knight of the Order of Santiago and member of the Consejo Supremo de Italia, was begun in Madrid on 15 September 1650. This was undertaken by his executors, his son and heir Don Bartolomé de Prado Bravo de Mendoza, knight of Santiago and royal secretary, Don Francisco Gracian Berruguete, a royal secretary and interpreter/translator, and the contador Garci Sánchez de Mena. The inventory of the goods in Prado Bravo de Mendoza's house was taken room by room in an orderly fashion, beginning with the oratory. Paintings were inventoried hanging in each room, except for a number that were leaning up against the wall of one room (f. 405), but the function of each room is not given in the document. Unfortunately, the inventory has suffered water damage and is now difficult to read. In the appraisals of goods from the estate, Don Francisco's paintings were valued by the royal painters Angelo Nardi (Pintor de su Majestad) and Juan Baptista del Mazo (Ujier de cámara y pintor) on 3 April 1651. In the Nardi/Mazo valuation only a selection of paintings that were to be offered for sale from this large collection were valued.

Despite the combined expertise of two royal painters and Nardi's acknowledged reputation as a connoisseur, only two paintings were clearly attributed in their appraisal. One was a painting of the Virgin by Eugenio Caxés (no. 7). The other was evidently a copy of Titian's Gloria (Madrid, Prado) from the Spanish royal collection, which was one of the most famous paintings at the Escorial (no. 4). The relatively high valuation given to the painting suggests that it was a high-quality work. It was not the only Titian in the collection, however, since a Tribute Money by the artist was also present in the earlier inventory (f. 393, "otro quadro del tributo del cesar de bara y media de largo y bara y quarta de ancho del ticiano"). In the same gallery ("la galeria que sale al patio de la fuente") there were also four paintings representing paired apostles by Juan Fernández de Navarrete (f. 393, "quatro liencos de tres [sic] apóstoles cada uno con dos con molduras doradas y bruñidas todos quatro del mudo"). These appear to have been pictures based on his apostle altarpieces at the Escorial, and were anonymous in the appraisal (no. 3). Furthermore, in the same place was a Meleagar and Atalanta by Rubens (f. 593, "Una pintura de quatro baras de ancho y ocho pies de cayda de Rubens – la qual es de una fabula de meliajar y atalantar"). The reason that this painting did not appear in the valuation may have been that it was reserved for the estate, to be inherited by Don Bartolomé de Prado Bravo. This painting would appear to have been a copy of the landscape version of this mythological subject by Rubens that was inventoried in the Madrid Alcázar in 1636,<sup>1</sup> or perhaps a painting by a follower of Rubens, such as Jacob Jordaens.<sup>2</sup>

Bravo de Mendoza's collection included another mythological painting, a Cupid and Psyche, that measured under one vara and was listed in the inventory only. Another classical subject, a Triumph of Scipio (i.e. Scipio Africanus) (no. 9) also appeared in the inventory, where it was said to be a large painting, four varas by three varas, with "many figures". A pendant painting valued as a Triumph of Melchizedek (no. 10) was inventoried as "de el tributo del cesar" (f. 389). The size and subject matter of these multi-figure paintings are entirely consistent with the work of Juan de la Corte. Prado Bravo de Mendoza's painting of the story of the Ethiopian princess Chariclea from Heliodorus' Aethiopica was a very unusual subject and perhaps reflects the depth of its owner's classical erudition.

From the evidence of Prado Bravo de Mendoza's inventory, the hanging of pictures in rooms of his house does not appear to have been responsive to thematic imperatives. Religious, profane, and decorative subjects were mixed together on the walls of all of the rooms. In some cases, however, series paintings gave a degree of thematic consistency to the rooms, but even this could not be described as a decorative program. For instance, one room (“otra pieça questa Junto a la rreferida acia la calle”) was decorated with four paintings of the story of Adam and Eve, which hung alongside a painting of the Five Senses and a large painting of a Flemish kermesse. In the previous room (“en la pieça antes de entrar en la galeria”) four paintings of the Creation hung with the genre painting of poor people and four fruit still lifes. Fruit still lifes were a major decorative element in the house, hanging in nine of the eleven rooms inventoried. The courtyard of the house (“el patio de la fuente”) was decorated solely with four fruit still lifes and three flowerpieces in a manner reminiscent of Sevillian houses. One small room (“la alcobilla questa cerca de la pieça grande de la calle”) was entirely decorated with fruit and flower paintings, made up of five fruit still lifes and six flowerpieces, one of which was from Italy. In the appraisal document, eight paintings of birds were specifically mentioned as forming part of the decoration of a room (nos. 21, 24), while there were so many still lifes that the majority were not itemized (nos. 15, 16, 40).

Gaspar de Haro y Guzmán, Marqués del Carpio, Marqués de Eliche, Duque de Montoro, Conde-Duque de Olivares and Conde de Morente

1651–1653

Don Gaspar de Haro y Guzmán, who was known to his contemporaries as the Marqués de Eliche, was baptized at Madrid on 1 June 1629. He was raised at court during the ministry of his great-uncle, the Conde-Duque de Olivares, from whom Don Gaspar was ultimately to inherit the Eliche estates and title.<sup>1</sup> In 1648, Don Gaspar's wealth was further increased by bequests from his mother's will. His inheritance, which consisted mostly of annual rents and mortgage income, was liquidated at nearly 500,000 reales (about 45,000 ducats). In 1650, Don Gaspar married Doña Maria Antonia de la Cerda, the Duque de Medinacoeli's fifteen-year-old daughter, whose beauty was celebrated internationally.<sup>2</sup> Doña Maria brought a dowry of 100,000 ducats to the wedding, and Don Gaspar in turn gave her 10,000 ducats in rents and another 3,000 ducats for her personal expenses.<sup>3</sup> In 1651, Don Gaspar inventoried his personal household; this inventory (the present document) probably indicates the point at which his and his wife's finances were separated from those of his father, Don Luis.<sup>4</sup>

Don Gaspar's artistic interests appear to have been among the few worthy character traits of his youth.<sup>5</sup> He was, for example, a notorious womanizer. Even after his marriage to a woman described as a great beauty,<sup>6</sup> Don Gaspar maintained a string of scandalous liaisons, often with actresses.<sup>7</sup> Perhaps the Rokeby Venus – one of the rare nudes in seventeenth-century Spanish art – may be related to this unbounded sexual appetite.

Alternating with the reports of scandalous behavior in contemporary chroniclers' accounts are reports of mysterious illnesses.<sup>8</sup> Don Gaspar was said to have been "hexed" by the women he frequented, and his infirmities were often explained in terms of other witchcraft or demonic possession,<sup>9</sup> all of which suggests that Don Gaspar either had an unbalanced mind or was suffering from venereal disease. Reports of public altercations with the Príncipe de Astillano and the Duque de Béjar, not to mention a long-standing rivalry with the Duque de Medina de las Torres, further strengthen the image of mental instability.<sup>10</sup> Later events would prove Don Gaspar capable of dangerous behavior.

As long as his father was alive to protect him, Don Gaspar's actions escaped royal censure. He also had an ally in King Philip himself. As an adolescent, Don Gaspar had been close to the Príncipe de Asturias (that is, the Crown Prince), Balthasar Carlos, a fact that evidently entitled him to a special place in Philip IV's affections, even after Balthasar Carlos's death in 1646.<sup>11</sup> What is more, Don Gaspar seems to have shared his father's ability to keep Philip IV amused, or at least distracted. Bertaut reported that, by 1659, Don Gaspar had "ingratiated himself into the spirit and pleasures of the king."<sup>12</sup> This royal favor was curried not only by the spectacles and dramas mounted at the Buen Retiro, but also by gifts, of which a trivial example may be cited. Late in 1655, the Duque de Uceda sent Don Gaspar a trained monkey, which Don Gaspar then presented to Philip IV, to the monarch's great pleasure.<sup>13</sup> Philip's affection for the young nobleman occasionally resulted in gifts of money. In April of 1658, the king gave Don Gaspar 30,000 ducats (or so it was reported) to help defray the costs of treatment at the medicinal baths in Aragon.<sup>14</sup>

After his father's death, however, Don Gaspar's position at court quickly deteriorated. (His management of the Retiro had already suffered a scandal, possibly involving a fire of suspicious origin, which sent Dionisio Mantovano temporarily to prison and torture in 1658 or 1659.)<sup>15</sup> The break with Philip IV came, appropriately, over a painting. The writer of a contemporary aviso reported the incident in this way:

The King is annoyed with Eliche over a number of things, and particularly in the matter of a highly esteemed painting which Don Luis had ordered him to give to the king as soon as Don

Luis was dead. And I don't know what kind of trade Eliche made, but the King greatly regretted it, although he held his peace, and Eliche has observed that the king no longer speaks to him with such tenderness and friendship as he was formerly accustomed to.<sup>16</sup>

This disagreement led to Don Gaspar's dismissal as alcaide of the Buen Retiro, the governance of which was then entrusted to Don Gaspar's arch-rival, Medina de las Torres.

Don Gaspar's reaction was dramatically reckless. In February of 1662, with the help of a Turkish slave named Ibas, Don Gaspar mined the Buen Retiro theater with four barrels of gunpowder. Apparently, Don Gaspar hoped the charges would be ignited in the course of a performance, but they were discovered beforehand by a carpenter. It was immediately assumed that an attempt was being planned on the king's life, although Don Gaspar may only have been seeking to embarrass Medina de las Torres, who was now responsible for the entertainments at the palace. Royal investigators soon focused their inquiry on Ibas, who had formerly served on the Buen Retiro staff and had been seen loitering in the vicinity of the palace. He was surrendered to the authorities by Don Gaspar on 20 February. The next day, fearing that Ibas would confess under torture, Don Gaspar sought to have him murdered, but this new plot was immediately betrayed. Don Gaspar was imprisoned in March 1662, and a lengthy process was drawn up against him.<sup>17</sup>

As a result the court was thrown into confusion. Indeed, because of the prominent role played by the Carpio family in the government of Philip IV, the scandal became something of a political crisis. Don Gaspar's relatives, such as Castrillo and Monterrey, alternately sought mercy and offered to resign their state offices.<sup>18</sup> The Marquesa de Eliche is said to have made a particularly eloquent plea for her husband's life.<sup>19</sup> Court gossips speculated that Don Gaspar had once again been bewitched or possessed by demons<sup>20</sup> – or, as we would say, that he was mentally ill. This opinion, along with the family's social position and Philip IV's fondness for Don Luis, seems to have saved Don Gaspar's life. A sentence was passed on 23 January 1663, dictating a fine of 10,000 ducats plus court costs and sentencing Don Gaspar to two more years in prison. He was also condemned to yet another eight years in exile.<sup>21</sup> Although his sentence was commuted in exchange for his offer to raise troops for the Spanish campaign against Portugal in June 1663, he was captured in battle and imprisoned at Lisbon for nearly five years.<sup>22</sup> Don Gaspar's internment had its theatrical touches, including two attempts to escape,<sup>23</sup> but he was also able to negotiate a peace treaty on behalf of the Spanish government. This was accomplished in 1668, and Don Gaspar returned to Madrid in triumph.<sup>24</sup> Contemporary reports indicate that, in spite of his difficult personal circumstances, Don Gaspar carefully attended to the needs of the Spanish soldiers captured with him.<sup>25</sup>

The years 1668–76 found Don Gaspar preoccupied with rebuilding both his personal life and his political career. His first wife died without issue in 1669, and in 1671 Don Gaspar married Doña Teresa Enríquez de Cabrera, daughter of the Almirante de Castilla.<sup>26</sup> An heir, Doña Catalina, was born in 1672.<sup>27</sup> His single court appointment, as alcaide of the royal forests, had little importance because the young Charles II was sickly, and the royal family made scant use of hunting preserves.<sup>28</sup> Don Gaspar did mount a few festivals and public works, but at least one of these projects, offered jointly by Don Gaspar and the Príncipe de Astillano in 1673, was pre-empted by Don Fernando de Valenzuela, the Queen Regent's favorite.<sup>29</sup> Contemporary reports portray Don Gaspar as a man respected but feared and even shunned by his peers;<sup>30</sup> the prevailing attitude seems to have been that Don Gaspar was best excluded from the centers of power. It was perhaps for this reason that he was appointed Ambassador before the Holy See in Rome. As has been suggested, Don Gaspar may have engineered the interim embassy of Padre Nitard as a means of delaying his own departure from court.<sup>31</sup> As frustrating as these political setbacks may have been, however, they would have allowed him to devote more effort to his collection of works of art.

Don Gaspar left Madrid in September 1676 but did not arrive in Rome until March 1677, remaining there until 1682. His presence in Rome brought him to the peak of his career as a patron and collector.

Ironically, the part of Don Gaspar's career that has been the most studied by political historians – his Neapolitan period – is in some ways the least known from the point of view of his collecting, in part because he left much less precise documentation for this period. One reason for this may have been his preoccupation with affairs of state. After a long series of exploitative and negligent viceroys, Naples found in Don Gaspar a leader prepared to rectify the kingdom's many ills, one who proceeded in short order to discipline the militia, repress the bandits, and reform the finances.<sup>32</sup> (Don Gaspar's first act upon arriving in the city, after a shockingly unelaborate "triumphal" entry, was to go to the Church of the Carmine and prostrate himself before the altar, praying for divine guidance.)<sup>33</sup> Clearly, Don Gaspar had other things on his mind beside pictures, much less idle time than had been his in Rome, and perhaps less money to devote to artistic endeavors.

Nevertheless, the arts continued to flourish under Don Gaspar's patronage in Naples, and his lifelong love of the theater found new expression. There was, for example, the portable theater that appears among the miscellaneous entries in the 1687 inventory. This stage, which was mounted on six wooden sawhorses (cavalletti), measured 26 palmi wide by 22 palmi deep.<sup>34</sup> The frames and flooring were made of fine hardwoods, and there were six wings which slid in pre-cut channels on the stage floor, eight overhead proscenium curtains (telaro del cielo con otto telaretti), and some 24 different sets, including a city view, a garden, interiors, and so forth. The basic structures may have been brought from Rome, but at least one of the scene curtains was fatti di nuovo from a tela di casa previously belonging to the Condestable de Castilla (probably a scribal error for the Almirante de Castilla, who served as Viceroy in the 1640s). Don Gaspar died in Naples, 16 November 1687.

As has already been noted in the Introduction, the 1648 collection of Don Luis and Doña Catalina and the 1651 collection of Don Gaspar do not overlap, except for two works specified as gifts from Don Luis (Doc. 49, nos. 332 and 333). Furthermore, Don Gaspar's gallery was notably profane: only about 20 percent of the works had sacred subjects.

A number of the pieces in the 1651 inventory can be identified. Chief among these is Velázquez's Rokeby Venus, now in the National Gallery, London.<sup>35</sup> No. 228, an Equestrian Portrait of Philip IV, has been identified as the work attributed to the school of Rubens in the Uffizi, the head of which was painted by Velázquez.<sup>36</sup> The two other works attributed to Velázquez in the inventory (nos. 96 and 172), have not been identified conclusively, but the Portrait of a Youth might be either of the pictures later in the Bridgewater collection, London (now Sutherland collection, Scotland), or the Galerie Harrach, Vienna.<sup>37</sup> Olivares on a White Horse (no. 239) is probably the work now in the Metropolitan Museum, New York, and two of the copies by Mazo after Titian, (nos. 238 and 244), are possibly related to copies after Titian, attributed to Mazo, now in the Prado.<sup>38</sup> The Equestrian Portrait of the Marqués de Aytona, attributed to Van Dyck (no. 177) in the inventory, is still in the Carpio (now Alba) collection (no. 183), as a copy after Van Dyck. Orpheus Flaying a Satyr by Ribera, no. 225 – probably an error for Apollo and Marsyas – may be one of two versions of this subject by Ribera at Brussels and Naples; such a work also appeared in the Serra collection inventory, as discussed in the Introduction. More identifications are indicated in the footnotes to the document.

Don Gaspar's gallery of 1651 showed him to be a collector of a different kind with many copies and uncertain attributions represented by incomplete entries in the inventory. Most of the works were small, as were the reputations of many of the masters. The influence of Don Luis (or at least of the canon of taste to which Don Luis subscribed) was apparent: the Venetians dominated the older pieces, and the tenebrist Stanzione was foremost among the seventeenth-century masters. As in Don Luis's collection, works by Van Dyck led the Flemish school. One cannot assume, however, that Don Luis actually assembled the collection. Two of the works were said to have been gifts from Don Luis, thus implying that the rest were purchases, and the Flemish emphasis, as has been noted, further separated Don Gaspar's taste from that of his father.

The subject matter of many of the works is likewise what one might expect to find in a "young" collection. Hunts, battles, satyrs, and the like appeared in Don Luis's collection, but only in a decorative capacity. In Don Gaspar's more modest gallery, they assumed a greater relative importance. Paintings with genre or "decorative" subjects were, of course, less expensive than monumental figured compositions, so it is logical that the young collector's gallery would have included many such works. (Don Gaspar would, however, continue to take an interest in this type of art, as indicated in his later inventories. Another aspect of the 1651 collection – the presence of many paired works and multiple-canvas series – would also carry over into his later acquisitions.)

The inventory of paintings taken by his contador, Don Carlos de Baracena,<sup>39</sup> appears to be the fifth section of the first book of a complete accounting of Don Gaspar's household. The document is covered by a folio sheet with the following inscription:

Md 1º de Junio de 1651 Libro Primero del menaje de la cassa del exmo. Sr. Don Gaspar Mendez de haro y Guzman Marques de Eliche mi Sor. Para la contaduria de la Cassa de S. E. Su Cont[ador] Don Carlos de Baracena [rúbrica].

Each entry in the document ends with the words, “tassado en ... ,” but there are no values given. Either the inventory was only a working copy, or there was subsequently no reason to liquidate the estate.

1. The title of Marqués de Eliche (also spelled “Heliche” and “Liche”) was created for Olivares’ daughter on the occasion of her marriage in 1624, but when she died without issue, the title was inherited by the sister of Olivares (her aunt) who was married to the 5th Marqués del Carpio. Don Gaspar was styled “Marqués de Eliche” by the time of his mother’s death in 1647 (Saltillo 1951, p. 170 n. and Saltillo 1953, pp. 233-34). It has not been determined what income the title may have generated in 1645.

2. See the remarks of the French visitors, Gramont and Bertaut, quoted in Andrés 1975, pp. 8–10.

3. Maura Gamazo 1911, p. 629.

4. Andrés 1975, p. 9, assumes that Don Gaspar and Doña Maria lived in Don Luis's house, at least until the fire of 1654. If this is true, the inventory of 1651 might have been an attempt to separate Don Gaspar and Doña Maria's belongings from the common household.
5. See Barrionuevo, letters nos. 153, 178, 181, 184, 189, 191, 200, 207–209, 212–13, 222, 251, and 260ff. – see also vol. 1, 1892, pp. 81, 98, 215, and 259 (miscellaneous notices of 1654–55). Whether from general moral outrage or some particular dislike for Don Gaspar, Barrionuevo's account seems biased against the Marqués (“Cosa mala nunca muere.” – letter no. 178, 7 March 1657). Barrionuevo's anonymous successor presents what appears to be a more objective account.
6. Bertaut, quoted in Andrés 1975, p. 11, described Doña Maria, Don Gaspar's first wife, as “the most beautiful woman in the world.”
7. See Barrionuevo, letters no. 181 and 222, as well as the contemporary reports quoted in Andrés 1975, pp. 11ff.

9. Ibid., vol. 1, pp. 81 and 259, wherein Barrionuevo makes the following observations: “El Marqués de Liche dicen está hechizado. Aún otros hablan más claro, diciendo son espíritus, y le conjuran de secreto. El Marqués de Liche ... ha estado estas días muy al cabo de una enfermedad que no la entienden.... Es mozo y hace mil desórdenes, en particular de mujeres, que piensan le tienen hechizado, gastando con ellas cuanto tiene y le dan, que no es poco.” On 21 October 1654, Barrionuevo (vol. 1, 1892, p. 98) reports that, because of Don Gaspar's worsening illness, an exorcism is sanctioned by the Inquisition.
10. Barrionuevo, letters 184 (26 May 1657) and 209 (30 January 1658) – vol. 3, 1893, p. 271, and vol. 4, 1894, p. 59, respectively. See also letters 212 and 251 – vol. 4, pp. 89 and 379 – and cf. Andrés 1975, p. 13, who describes Medina de las Torres as Don Gaspar's “greatest enemy.” See also Marañón 1965, p. 124, for observations on mental instability in Olivares' family.
11. See Biblioteca Nacional, Madrid, Sección de Manuscritos, ms. no. 18722-56, f. 204: “Don Gaspar was highly favored by the Crown Prince Balthasar Carlos in his younger years, and this favor was granted with the highest approval of his father, Philip IV. After the death of the Prince at Zaragoza in 1646, the Marqués had the will of the King as much as he had that of his father, Don Luis.”
12. Quoted in Andrés 1975, p. 11.

14. Ibid., letter 213, 10 April 1658 (1894, vol. 4, p. 92). 30,000 ducats is an immense sum for such a purpose; perhaps the grant was in reales or maravedies.
15. Mantovano was eventually exonerated. His deliverance via the miraculous intervention of the Virgin Mary is recounted in pious detail by Palomino 1947, vol. 3, pp. 1012–13. See also British Library, London, Egerton ms. 349, f. 84 and additional ms. 28, 452, f. 329.

All three rely on Barrionuevo's anonymous successor, letters 260 (5 March 1662) and following. At the time of his imprisonment, Don Gaspar was said to have possessed an estate worth “two million in gold and silver, and the best alhajas in the world, and 150,000 ducats in yearly rents.” (Anonymous chronicler, in Barrionuevo, letter 260 – also quoted by Andrés 1975, p. 19, whose source adds mention of large debts owed to artisans in Madrid.) This information, based as it is on court gossip, is highly unreliable.
18. Anonymous chronicler, in Barrionuevo, letter 261 (vol. 4, 1894, pp. 433–35; 1969, vol. 2, pp. 273–74).

22. See Maura Gamazo 1911, pp. 635–36, and Andrés 1975, pp. 21–23. Gaps in the sequence of reports from Barrionuevo's anonymous successor (letters skip from 26 August 1662, to 19 May 1663, to 28 July 1663) leave many of Don Gaspar's activities after his sentencing in the dark. Maura Gamazo assumes (1911, p. 635) that Don Gaspar was captured at the battle of Estremoz, 8 June 1663, but does not cite documentation.
23. Anonymous chronicler, in Barrionuevo, letter 274 (16 October 1663), vol. 4, 1894, p. 488 – cf. Biblioteca Nacional, Madrid, ms. no. 2280, entire vol. . In his second attempt to escape, Don Gaspar disguised himself in women's clothes, marched out of his prison behind a corps of guardsmen, and was hidden on a ship, being apprehended only when a customs guard opened the suspicious-looking trunk in which he was hiding.
24. See the account in Biblioteca Nacional, Madrid, Sección de Manuscritos, ms. no. 18722-56, f. 204. According to the Grande Enciclopedia Portuguesa e Brasileira, Lisbon n.d., vol. 5, p. 990, Don Gaspar negotiated the peace in 1667 and signed the treaty at the Convent of St. Eloy, Lisbon, 13 February 1668. The treaty was ratified by Spain on 23 February of the same year, thus providing a terminus post quem for Don Gaspar's return to Madrid.
25. Anonymous Chronicler, in Barrionuevo, letter 269 (4 August 1663) – vol. 4, 1894, p. 469.
26. The wedding may have had political significance. According to Maura Gamazo, vol. 2, 1915, p. 83, the Almirante was a supporter of the Queen Mother, whereas Castrillo and Monterrey often opposed her in the deliberations of the junta del gobierno. The Almirante was also the owner of one of the most important private collections in Madrid (see Docs. 43 and 117).

30. Madame d'Aulnoy (quoted in Andrés 1924, p. 24) left the following remembrance of Don Gaspar: “He was both generous and miserly: in matters of ostentation, he could carry magnificence to excess; but on other occasions he scrimped in the most stingy way. He was ugly, although he was talented, insightful, and extraordinarily lively – a great man, very ambitious and enterprising. He was feared at court, to the extent of being avoided whenever it was possible.”

38. Prado nos. 424 and 423, respectively. The Prado canvases are 96 x 107 cm.; the Carpio pieces would have measured about 170 x 210 cm.

39. Published, with transcriptions of selected entries, by J.M. Pita Andrade in Archivo Español de Arte, vol. 25, 1952, pp. 223–36; also referred to by E. Harris in Archivo Español de Arte, vol. 30, 1959, pp. 136–139; and by Pita Andrade in Varia Velazqueña, vol. 1, Madrid 1960, pp. 400–413; also published in an English translation in Burke 1984, vol. 2, Document 4.1. As Pita Andrade has remarked, there can be little doubt of the relation between this covering sheet and the inventory, as they are in the same hand and on paper bearing the same watermark (1952, p. 226).

40. This is probably Juan van der Hamen y León's Still Life with Sweets and Glassware (Fig. 43) in the Prado (1.164). It does not appear in the royal inventories until 1702.

41. Juan de Espinosa's Still Life with Dead Finch and Grapes (Fig. 44) now in the Prado (2.861).

42. This is very likely Juan Fernández's Vase of Flowers (Fig. 45) in the Prado (2.888). See Jordan and Cherry, Spanish Still Life from Velázquez to Goya, 1995, p. 212, no. 24.

43. This can be positively identified as Rubens' Entombment (Fig. 46) in the J. Paul Getty Museum (93.PA.9). Interestingly, this is the first known work from Carpio's collection with a corresponding Madrid inventory number; the number 146 is written in white paint in the lower left corner. Previously, only works from the Italian inventories of Carpio's collection were known to have corresponding inventory numbers inscribed on them, and then only on the reverse.

44. Pérez Sánchez (1977) conjectures that this is Titian's Saint Catherine of Alexandria at Prayer (Fig. 47) in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts (48.499) and that it passed through the Conde de Monterrey's collection to the Marqués del Carpio. (Although this Carpio inventory was started in 1651, additional entries were made in 1653 - the same year that Monterrey's collection was inventoried. See also Doc. 57, no. 69 and Doc. 115, no. 560.) Carpio's Titian went to the king in 1691 as noted in the annotation for this painting in Doc. 115, and the Boston picture is said to have come from El Escorial. However, it should also be noted that there was a picture of St. Catherine by Titian recorded in the Sacristy of El Escorial as early as 1599, and in the Iglesia Vieja in 1800.

45. This is now tentatively attributed to Hendrik van Balen as a copy after Rubens, Virgin and Child with Saints (Fig. 48) in the Prado (1.703). See also Carpio's later Madrid inventory where this picture again appears, Doc. 115, no. 493.

46. This picture, presently in the Alba Collection (183) and considered a copy after Van Dyck, is inventoried in the Carpio collection as early as 1648 (Doc. 45, no. 102). It is also in Gaspar's later Madrid inventory of 1689 (see Doc. 115, no. 235).

47. Studio of Rubens, Portrait of Archduke Albrecht (Fig. 49), Windsor Castle (ACC 612559). See A. Vergara, "Don Rodrigo Calderón y la Introducción del Arte de Rubens en España," Archivo Español de Arte, 267 (1994), pp. 275–283. This picture appears again in Carpio's Madrid inventory of 1689 (see Doc. 115, no. 241).

48. This is the earliest known provenance of Velázquez's Rokeby Venus (Fig. 16), London National Gallery (2057), which stayed in the Carpio collection until ca. 1800 when the Duquesa de Alba gave or sold the picture to Manuel Godoy, Príncipe de la Paz.

49. This picture can be identified as the Equestrian Portrait of Philip IV, attributed to the school of Rubens with the head by Velázquez. It was among the works damaged in the bombing at the Uffizi Gallery in 1993.

50. This picture, along with its companions (nos. 238, 244 and 248), was no doubt copied by Mazo after Titian's Poesie series when all four works were in the Spanish royal collection. The present location of these copies is not known.

51. Probably the portrait in the Metropolitan Museum (52.125) attributed to Velázquez or Mazo (Fig. 50). The Metropolitan's picture measures 127.6 x 104.1 cms., whereas the dimensions given here are equivalent to ca. 126 x 126 cms. Pita Andrade considered this portrait to be either the Metropolitan picture or the work in Schleissheim (1794), the latter measuring 135 x 114 cms. (J.M. Pita Andrade, "Los cuadros de Velázquez y Mazo que poseyó el séptimo Marqués del Carpio," Archivo Español de Arte, 25, no. 99 (1952), pp. 223–236). See also Velázquez exhibition catalogue, New York, Metropolitan Museum, 1989, p. 159.

52. See the inventory of the 10th Almirante de Castilla (Doc. 117, no. 73). He appears to have owned the original work from which this item was copied.

The inventory of Don Enrique de Aragón, Conde de Sastago, deceased, was drawn up by one of his executors Don Luis de Guzman Ponce de Leon, and begun in Madrid on 3 October 1651. The collection of paintings was relatively small and no artists are mentioned, but there was a surprisingly wide range of subjects. Mythological subjects such as Venus and Adonis, Diana and Actaeon, Europa, Andromeda, etc., were the most numerous, and there were also a few scenes from classical history, including Cleopatra and “Roman Charity” (Cimon and Pero). The religious themes were limited primarily to Old Testament subjects, implying that the conde was collecting them for their aesthetic or even thematic value rather than as objects of devotion. Aside from such historical paintings, however, there were also landscapes, pictures with chickens and singing birds, a marine scene and a number of portraits, mostly of family members. Since we do not have the valuations for the collection, it is difficult to determine how important the individual paintings were, but their description causes us to regret that we do not know more.

The postmortem inventory of the licenciado Don Francisco Cea, presbyter and Comisario del Santo Oficio de la Inquisición de Toledo, begun in Madrid on 26 February 1652, contained a number of paintings transcribed here, appraised on 27 February by the painter Juan Rodríguez. Among the 12 religious subjects was a painting of St. Paul copied after Ribera (no. 7). Seven other paintings were listed as Italian and included two mythologies (nos. 2 and 3), a genre painting of a woman with a turkey (no. 2), and an allegory of Vanitas (no. 3). The descriptions of the three others are too imprecise to be certain of the subjects; they were listed as a woman at the clavichord (no. 1), a nude man and woman with two swans and two dogs (no. 1), and two figures with rabbits (no. 3). Four paintings of gypsies (no. 4) may have been pictures of a type made popular by the Roman Bamboccianti. The rest of the collection was made up of series of portraits (no. 17), flowerpieces (nos. 5, 13), still lifes (no. 15), and landscapes (nos. 12, 14, 16).

The postmortem inventory of Bernardo Fernández de Velasco y Tovar, Condestable de Castilla y de León, drawn up by his executors, the Duquesa de Frias, Marquesa de Verlanga and Luís Fernández de Tovar y Velasco, Marqués de Fresno, began in Madrid on 31 March 1652. The large picture collection was inventoried between 23–28 August 1652 (ff. 1422–1425v), but no appraisal was recorded.

Despite the obvious importance of the collection, none of the paintings listed was attributed to an artist. Some of the subjects were typical of collections formed at the turn of the century, such as the series of Seven Infantes of Lara (no. 36) and portraits of popes, cardinals, and famous men (no. 59). The large numbers of family portraits in the collection undoubtedly formed a part of the inheritance of the Condestable, including the series of 46 portraits of his ancestors (no. 21). There were three portraits of Bernardo himself, one of which was only sketched in (nos. 24, 27, 28). One ancestor, Don Juan de Velasco, Condestable de Castilla and Duque de Frías (d.1613), was portrayed with the Spanish delegation at the signing of the peace treaty with England in 1604 (no. 29).<sup>1</sup>

The collection contained mythological subjects, including three of Venus (nos. 41, 54, and 61), one of Diana (no. 51), and one of Ganymede (no. 50). A pair of paintings of female figures were personifications of the Liberal Arts of Music and Grammar (no. 57). Two paintings of Venetian women (no. 57) were probably representations of ideal beauties, but a picture of a lady with a devil at her side (no. 38), flanked by two fruit still lifes, perhaps signified a more misogynistic view. A number of hunting paintings (no. 45), pictures of fishing and fowling (nos. 55), and fishing subjects (no. 44) appropriately evoked noble country pursuits. Landscapes (no. 46) and pictures of the Seasons and Months (nos. 48 and 49) were also consistent with this theme and aristocratic taste.

The postmortem inventory and valuation of the estate of Don Fernando de Tinoco, a Knight of the Order of Christ and Treasurer of the Consejo de Portugal, and his wife Violante Correa, was drawn up on 14 October 1652, with their paintings valued by the painter Mateo Gallardo (ca.1600–1667) (ff. 35v–37).

The single most valuable painting in Gallardo's list was a St. John the Baptist by Pedro de Orrente (no. 3), worth 2,200 reales, followed by an unattributed Immaculate Conception, worth 1,500 reales (no. 18). Four large and valuable paintings of the story of Alexander the Great, however, headed the inventory (no. 1); while these were appraised at 400 ducats, they were not attributed in the document. They were conceivably by a Spanish hand, perhaps Juan de la Corte, if they depicted small figures. Tinoco owned a painting of St. Anthony by Vicencio Carducho (no. 5), and Mateo Gallardo at first mistook a picture of St. John the Evangelist for another Carducho (no. 4), perhaps because of their similarity of style. Gallardo immediately rectified his opinion and attributed the work to Carducho's contemporary and court colleague, Angelo Nardi. However, neither painting came near to the high valuation given to Orrente's St. John the Baptist (no. 3).

Most of the religious paintings in Tinoco's collection were depictions of saints; two of these, representing St. Peter and the Magdalene (no. 13), were probably paired as penitent saints. A painting attributed to Veronese depicted the Four Elements in a single painting (no. 14), and was possibly painted after Veronese's frescoes in the Sala dell'Olimpio in the Villa Maser, which are his only known representations of these subjects. Tinoco, like many of his contemporaries, owned paintings in thematic sets. There was a set of 12 mythologies, whose subject matter was not specified (no. 20). A group of 12 paintings by Andrea Michieli represented the Twelve Months (no. 15). Other landscapes grouped in lots of twelve may also have represented the months (no. 21), and there was also a set of the Four Seasons (no. 6). Six perspectival scenes by "monsieur" (no. 16) were perhaps by Monsu Didier Barra, who worked in Naples.

Juan Alonso de Pimentel y Ponce de León,
Conde de Luna and Conde Duque de Benavente

1652–1653

The house of Pimentel, Condes(-Duques) de Benavente, was one of the most illustrious families in Spain and maintained an exceptionally close relationship with the Hapsburg monarchs from the reign of Philip II to the end of the seventeenth century. The condado of Benavente was conceded 17 May 1398, and the ducado 28 January 1473.<sup>1</sup> The titles are now incorporated into the ducado of Osuna, along with the titles of the Almirante; as a consequence, many of the family archives are now found in the sección Osuna of the AHN.

Because the Benavente titles included both a condado and a ducado, the Benaventés could be referred to in documents either as Condes or Duques, not to mention Conde-Duques, although (as with Olivares) the usage was generally Conde.

The following genealogy of the male members of the family (with the dates of their reigns) is taken from family documents in the AHN:

VIII. Don Juan Alfonso de Pimentel (reigned 1575–[1611? 1621?]);

Viceroy of Naples and of Valencia

IX. Don Antonio Alfonso de Pimentel ([1611? 1621?] – 1633); married to Doña Leonor María de Pimentel (d. 1656)

X. Don Juan [Francisco] Alfonso de Pimentel y Herrera (1633–1652)

XI. Don Antonio Alfonso de Pimentel (1652–1677)

XII. Don Francisco Casimiro de Pimentel (1677–1709)

XIII. Don Antonio Alfonso de Pimentel (1709–1743).

A discrepancy exists within the AHN documents for the death of the 8th Conde-Duque. While many of the individual documents are dated from 1611–14, implying a death date of 1611, the date is also given in various documents in this series as 1621. Since the AHN documents are copies made for the Benavente family at a later date, it is possible that the numerals “2” and “1” – which are similarly shaped in seventeenth-century calligraphy – have been confused.

Extensive documentation, miscellaneous inventories, and lists are found among the family papers now in the AHN Sección Osuna, legajos 429, 430, and 440/2 (as well as the AHPM and Palace archives); additional lists from the end of the seventeenth century may be found in AHN Sección Osuna, cartas, [legajo?] 608, cited by Morán and Checa 1985, p. 301.

The documentation transcribed in this volume covers three inventories:

(1) The inventory of Doña Leonor María de Pimentel, dowager Condesa de Benavente (d. 31 January 1656) widow of Don Antonio Alfonso de Pimentel, 9th Conde[-Duque] de Benavente, who had died in 1633. (Assuming that the document is correct in identifying Doña Leonor’s husband as the 9th Conde, the Condesa must have been nearly ninety years old when she died, since her son was born in 1584 and had in fact already died, in 1652.) The inventory is Document 65 in this publication.

(2–3) The present documents: two inventories of her son, Don Juan Francisco Alfonso de Pimentel, 10th Conde[-Duque], who apparently died in December 1652.<sup>2</sup>

The inventory was taken by his brother, Don Luis Pimentel, and his widow, Doña Antonia de Mendoza. The valuation was begun on 26 January 1653, which would indicate that the Conde died in December 1652, even though the inventory is dated 25 December 1653 in the document – probably a typographical error. The paintings were appraised on 10 February 1653 by Diego Valentin Díaz and Tomás de Peñasco, along with the sculptures which were appraised by Pedro Salvador. The inventory and valuation proceed through the Conde's palace in Valladolid, beginning in the chapel.

Among the tapestries is a set of 12 panels depicting the Twelve Months of the Year, valued at 9,600 reales.

Juan Alonso de Pimentel y Ponce de León,
Conde de Luna and Conde Duque de Benavente

ca. 1653–1657

This is a list of appraised objects left by a deceased Conde de Benavente<sup>1</sup> – presumably the 10th Conde Duque de Benavente, Don Juan Francisco Alfonso de Pimentel (d. 1652) – accounted for by a steward, Urban de Machuca, date and place unspecified, but probably Valladolid, ca. 1653–57. The list indicates the people (heirs?) who received the items, and included approximately seventy unnumbered lots of pictures, with several multiple lots, among other objects. Most of the attributed pictures were turned over to Don García Ramírez, caballerizo to the Conde. Several of the lots of bronze sculptures are noted as vinculados – that is, “entailed,” indicating that the objects had been incorporated into the mayorazgo of the Benavente titles – because the bronze came from objects in the Castle of Benavente, the seat of the condado.

Don Manuel de Azevedo y Zúñiga, 6th Conde de Monterrey, was born ca. 1590, the son of Don Gaspar de Azevedo y Zúñiga (1560?–1606), 5th Conde de Monterrey and Viceroy of Mexico and Peru, and Doña Inés de Velasco y Aragón (1567–1592). Other members of the Zúñiga family had also been prominent in foreign service: for example, Don Manuel's uncle, Don Baltasar de Zúñiga (died 1622), served as ambassador before the Holy See in Rome under Philip III and was later the leading statesman during the transition to the reign of Philip IV.<sup>1</sup>

In 1607, Don Manuel married Doña Leonor María de Guzmán (1591–1654/55), daughter of Don Enrique de Guzmán, 2nd Conde de Olivares (died 1607) and Doña María Pimentel de Azevedo y Zúñiga, who was Don Manuel's aunt. This marriage was coupled with that of Don Manuel's sister, Doña Inés de Zúñiga (died 1647), to Don Gaspar de Guzmán (1587–1645), who would become the Conde-Duque de Olivares and válido to Philip IV. Don Manuel and Doña Leonor would remain childless, so that the titles of Monterrey would pass to their first cousin, once removed, Doña Inés-Francisca de Zúñiga (ca. 1635–1710), granddaughter of the ambassador Don Baltasar. As it happened, Doña Inés-Francisca married, in 1652, Don Juan Domingo de Haro (ca. 1635?–1716), who was the son of Don Luis de Haro and the grand-nephew of the Conde-Duque de Olivares, with the result that the houses of Monterrey, Olivares, and Haro (the Marqueses del Carpio) were interlocked in a potent political alliance. This also complicated the succession of titles and, therefore, of each family's inheritance of pictures.

In 1628, Don Manuel was appointed ambassador in Rome; he then served as Viceroy of Naples from 1631 to 1637. Don Manuel died in 1653 and Doña Leonor in late 1654 or early 1655. Their activities as patrons are discussed in the Introduction.

Previous scholars have expressed surprise at the relatively small numbers of works in the Monterrey inventories. Indeed, in comparison to the holdings of the Carpios, Leganés, and the Almirantes, the approximately 265 Monterrey pictures inventoried in 1653 seem almost sparse.<sup>2</sup> However, the Monterrey inventory of 1653 does not encompass the entire estate. In addition to the house and gallery on the Prado, Don Manuel owned a house on the Plaza de Santo Domingo,<sup>3</sup> another palace in Salamanca, and a seat in the Galician town of Monterrey (in Orense near the Portuguese border). Furthermore, as we shall see, his wife seems to have owned her pictures in her own right. The 1653 inventory itself is unusually disorganized, especially in the lack of coordination between the original enumerative inventory and the subsequent valuation. It is consequently difficult even to say whether all of the pictures at the Prado location, not to mention those at the other Madrid house, were included.<sup>4</sup>

One must also augment one's understanding of the Monterrey collection with the information garnered from the inventory of the Condesa, Doña Leonor, who in addition to being a collector in her own right, was certainly important in the Salamanca commissions. The fact that the Condesa's inventory of 1655 offers a relatively small overlap with that of 1653 most likely suggests that the pictures had been hers all along and not part of the common property, although it is theoretically possible that she collected the additional works in the less than two years between her husband's death and her own. In either case, we appear to have evidence of the activities of a woman collector, just as we now know that the Duquesa de Osuna was an important patron.

Unfortunately, our appreciation of the works of art has been dimmed by the limited knowledge of Seicento painting which the painter Antonio de Pereda, the appraiser in both cases, brought to his tasks. It would seem that Pereda provided attributions only for older artists or for seventeenth-century masters well-known in Spain, like Ribera and Orazio Borgianni. Indeed, the names of contemporary artists that appear in the 1653 valuation seem to have been provided before the inventory was made. Consequently, many of the Monterrey pictures remained unattributed in both 1653 and 1655, and other documented works are not accounted for. For example, Carducho, writing before 1633, had located “grandiose drawings of The Swimmers in colored chalk by the hand of Michelangelo” in the Monterrey gallery and cited a Holy Family by Raphael, which Don Manuel had obtained from the Carmelitas Descalzas convent in Valladolid.<sup>5</sup> Nevertheless, as noted in the Introduction, even the fragmentary evidence suggests an extremely impressive gallery.

Certain other aspects of the inventory process itself, already noted by Pérez Sánchez with regard to the 1653 inventory,<sup>6</sup> are important enough to bear repeating. In the first place, Pereda, in spite of his own reluctance to attribute works, seems to have used his appraisals as vehicles for occasional comments on a given attribution. Thus, no. 109, a small St. Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventure, attributed to Titian in the inventory, is listed in the valuation without attribution at 77 reales – a relatively tiny sum. Less certain is Pereda’s opinion on no. 6, a Cupid attributed to Titian in the inventory, which again Pereda lists without attribution but at the middling price of 1,800 reales in the valuation. One may reasonably speculate whether a strong-willed widow with her own interest in collecting might have intervened in Pereda’s activities, causing him to keep quiet about some works and quietly drop disputed attributions in other cases.

One identification by Pérez Sánchez, that of a St. Catherine Adoring the Crucifix, no. 69 in 1653, with a painting now in Boston (no. 48.499), serves to underscore the complicated inter-relationship between the Monterrey and Olivares-Carpio families. In 1651 (two years before the Conde de Monterrey’s death) a painting of an identical subject, attributed to Titian, appeared in the inventory of Don Gaspar de Haro, the son of Don Luis de Haro (Doc. 49, no. 155). Don Gaspar’s inventory is more detailed than that of the Monterrey inventory, and it appears to describe the Boston picture exactly, if one substitutes “tree” (arbol) given in the description for “arch” (arco). According to the Duque del Berwick y Alba, this painting was willed to Charles II in 1675, but the offer was revoked by Don Gaspar sometime before his death in Naples in 1687.<sup>7</sup> At any rate, the picture appears in the Haro (Carpio) inventory of 1689 (Doc. 115, no. 561). Wethey considers it a workshop piece but implies extensive participation by Titian himself. The facts just cited yield two possibilities: either there were two very similar pictures of St. Catherine by Titian in seventeenth-century Madrid, or there was only one picture, which moved back and forth between the Monterrey and Haro/Carpio collections. The latter option seems by far the most reasonable: the subject is unique in Titian’s extant oeuvre, and the very high valuations – 4,950 reales in 1653 and 22,000 in 1689 – suggest that the inventoried works were both thought originals at the time. Furthermore, there is evidence that the two collections shaded together in the next generation: Berwick y Alba cites a letter by Don Gaspar de Haro, seeking to sell two more of the Monterrey canvases, a Venus and Adonis and a Monstrous Boy, both by Ribera (1653 nos. 4 and 186), for expenses related to his supervision of the Buen Retiro in 1656.<sup>8</sup> Since the Monterrey estate was the property of Don Gaspar’s brother and sister-in-law, Doña Inés-Francisca de Zúñiga, Condesa de Monterrey from 1653, one must assume that either Don Gaspar had acquired two of the Monterrey works or he had asked his family to help subsidize the palace’s upkeep.<sup>9</sup> In either case, it is clear that the Monterrey and Haro/Carpio collections were closely linked.

1. Paz y Espeso 1948; Elliott 1968, pp. 325–26.

2. Published by Pérez Sánchez, in Boletín de la Real Academia de la Historia, vol. 174, no. 3, 1977, pp. 417–59 and illustrations. As Pérez Sánchez makes clear, there is no one-to-one correspondence between the 1653 Monterrey inventory and the subsequent valuation. He nevertheless attempted to combine the two into one transcription, assigning lot numbers on the basis of the inventory. The transcriptions here are given verbatim.

3. Brown and Elliott 1980, p. 225, citing a letter by Fulvio Testi dated 19 November 1638 (Lettere, vol. 3, letter no. 1345).

4. The inventory does speak of “las casas del dicho conde” (Pérez Sánchez 1977, pp. 420f.), but the plural was conventional in seventeenth-century documents. The inventory of paintings (22 April 1653) was, on the other hand, specifically located at the Jardín – that is, in the gallery on the Prado – but this datum is itself compromised by the lack of one-to-one correspondence between the April inventory and Pereda’s valuations, 6–9 May.

5. Carducho 1633, fols. 148 and 151 – reprinted in Sánchez Canton, vol. 2, pp. 100f. and 103. Carducho indicates that Don Manuel had the painting by Raphael restored and intended to take it to Italy. Pérez Sánchez identifies it with no. 120 in the 1653 inventory. Carducho’s report of the Michelangelo drawing is corroborated by contemporary Jesuit letters; see Pérez Sánchez 1977, pp. 419f. – citing Cartas de Jesuitas, in Memorial Histórico Español, vol. 14, pp. 276 and 346.

9. This sequence of events, which I worked out jointly with Dr. Felton, has been published by him in a different context, with information on other related works; see Felton 1982, pp. 178–181.

10. This picture was identified by A.E. Pérez Sánchez in “Las colecciones de pintura del Conde de Monterrey (1653),” Boletín de la Real Academia de la Historia (1977), pp.417-459, as the Venetian sixteenth-century Conversation of the Marchese di Pescara (Fig. 52) in the Prado (526). It appears again in the other two Conde de Monterrey documents included in this publication: see Doc. 58, no. 18 and Doc. 61, no. 9.

11. Possibly Titian’s Saint Catherine of Alexandria at Prayer (Fig. 47) in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts (48.499); see Note for no. 155 of Document 49.

12. Pérez Sánchez (1977) believes this picture to be Salviati’s Madonna del Pappagallo (Fig. 53) in the Prado (477).

Conde de Fuentes and Conde de Monterrey

This valuation immediately followed the Conde de Monterrey's 1653 inventory (Doc. 57). There are two sets of inventory numbers assigned to many items in the document.
